REDUCTION OF ANNUAL LEAVE OF FEDERAL OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to reduce the annual leave of Federal officers and employees to 15 days during the continuance of the existing national emergency, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill together with a statement by me explaining the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the full statement will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from South Dakota.

The bill (S. 832) to reduce the annual leave of Federal officers and employees to 15 days during the continuance of the existing national emergency, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. CASE, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That from and after July 1, 1951, and during the continuance of the present national emergency proclaimed by the President on December 16, 1950, annual leave with pay shall be granted and allowed to civilian officers and employees of the Government of the United States whose appointments are on an annual or monthly basis at the rate of not to exceed 15 working days per annum. No such annual leave shall be accrued and carried forward from one fiscal year to another fiscal year, but shall be taken and used during the fiscal year in which the same shall be earned from and after July 1, 1951: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting any annual leave that has heretofore been or shall be accrued to and including June 30, 1951.

SEC. 2. All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby suspended during the continuance of the existing national emergency proclaimed by the President by Proclamation No. 2914 of December 16, 1950.

The statement presented by Mr. CASE is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CASE

Today, I am introducing in the Senate a companion bill to that introduced by the Honorable CHARLES VURSELL in the House of Representatives to make the annual leave privileges of regular Federal employees the same as that of postal employees during the declared national emergency.

This bill will save from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 per year during the national emergency.

The terms of the bill cut back the present 26-day annual leave for nonpostal employees to the 15-day leave rights of the postal employees. It does not affect the 500,000 postal workers who have never had more than 15 days annual leave with pay. It does not affect sick leave.

When one remembers that the 15 days leave means the working days of three 5-day weeks, this does not seem an unfair request to make during a national emergency. This bill does not affect existing law which provides increased pay for overtime above 40 hours.

The accumulation of accrued leave from year to year has created a liability against the Government of $581,000,000 today. That is a real national debt not shown in Treasury figures. It is a bill the Government must pay under the law. The proposal which Mr. VURSELL and I have made would prevent that amount from growing by requiring that annual leave must be taken in the year for which it accrues. The purpose of establishing leave was to increase efficiency. The Government does not get that increased efficiency when leave is permitted to pile up and become simply a new debt.

I feel sure that the great rank and file of the citizens of the country, if they could speak, would say that they see no reason why nonpostal employees should receive 26 days of leave, not counting sick leave, when postal employees receive only 15. This proposal should be adopted for the national emergency.

TEMPORARY NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish a temporary National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me explaining the purposes of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Minnesota will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 836) to establish a temporary National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The statement presented by Mr. HUMPHREY is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

I am again introducing a bill to create a temporary bipartisan National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. This bill is identical with one introduced by me last year with the cosponsorship of 41 Senators.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

The volume and complexity of relationships between the Federal Government and State and local governments will be substantially increased as a result of the defense mobilization program. I, therefore, feel it is extremely essential that the establishment of a National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations not be delayed, and that the Commission be instructed to submit its report as well as its recommendations as soon as possible. Federal activity in the fields of defense housing, supply and distribution of farm labor, emergency maternity and infant care, maintenance of community facilities, payments in lieu of taxes, employment administration, and civilian defense will account for this increase in conflicts between levels of government.

It was the Hoover Commission's specific recommendation that such a Commission be established not only because Federal-State relations is a question of our federal system of government, but also to accomplish its other recommendations in an adequate and orderly manner. Although the Hoover Commission recommended that such a Commission be of a continuing nature, I feel it is only fair that the Congress have an opportunity to review such a Commission's work before establishing it on a permanent basis; and, therefore, the bill which I have introduced provides for a temporary Commission. I do not, however, wish this to be interpreted as precluding the temporary Commission's becoming a continuing one if that should prove desirable.

I anticipate that this bipartisan Commission would divide its recommendations into two categories: those affecting the present emergency and those of a permanent or nonemergency character. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations in the Eighty-first Congress, at which time extensive hearings were held, I can say that the testimony was both unanimously and enthusiastically in favor of the establishment of such a Commission.

DISTRIBUTION OF TRIBUNAL FUNDS OF COLVILLE INDIANS

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for per capita distribution of tribal funds of the Colville Indians, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a statment by me explaining the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Washington. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 838) to provide for per capita distribution of tribal funds of the Colville Indians, introduced by Mr. CAIN, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to distribute per capita to the enrolled members of the Colville Indian Tribe who are living at the date of such payment all funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such tribe on the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 2. Amounts paid to members of the Colville Tribe under this act shall not be subject to any lien or other claim arising prior to the date of such payment.

The statement presented by Mr. CAIN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

Under the terms of an act of the Congress dated February 12, 1929, there was established in the United States Treasury a fund to be held in trust for the Colville Indian Tribe of Washington State. This fund has increased through timber sales, grazing fees, and accrued interest to the sum of $1,498,905.25 as of February 8, 1951. This money, on deposit with the United States Treasury, to the credit of the enrolled members of the Colville Tribe, is drawing interest as provided in the statute at the rate of 4 percent per annum, payable semiannually.

On November 21, 1950, a Senate subcommittee held a public hearing in Spokane, Wash., on legislation then pending pertinent to the Colville Tribe. As part of the official record of that hearing, there was introduced a petition, signed by 599 members of the Colville Tribe. I quote in part from that petition, which, Mr. President, may be found in its entirety in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 22, 1951, on page 491:

"Whereas $1,600,000 of Colville Indian funds is now in the hands of the United States Government from the sale of timber and the leasing of grazing lands;

* * * * * *

"It is therefore necessary for the undersigned to take action by this petition for the purpose of distributing the above funds for the general benefit and welfare of the whole tribe; and therefore, the undersigned hereby petition Congress to authorize the distribution of said fund by a per capita payment to the Colville Indian Tribe.

"CHRISTINE WILLIAMS

I am informed that the 599 petitioners, who ask that the money now held for their account in the United States Treasury be distributed to them, comprise a majority of the adult members of the tribe presently living on the reservation.

Therefore, first because these tribal members have petitioned the Congress for this per capita payment, and secondly, in behalf of the American taxpayer, who has and presently pays annual interest on this trust fund in the amount of $60,000, the junior Senator from Washington believes the bill just sent to the desk for appropriate reference to be in the public interest, and commends its serious consideration to his colleagues.

ALICE IBRAHIM HANNAN IBRAHIM, ET AL.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill for the relief of Alice Ibrahim Hannan Ibrahim, Yacoub Mayous Muhannad Elliyan, Afifeh Michail Jiries Issa Matar, Ellen Issa Zakaria, Ruth Naomi Schut, and Roseileen Schut, six children who are refugees from the Palestine war. I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me explaining the bill, and an article from the Yakima Republic by Ray Ruppert, which gives a good summary of this case be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement presented by the Senator from Washington, together with the article from the Yakima Republic will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 839) for the relief of Alice Ibrahim Hannan Ibrahim, Yacoub Mayous Muhannad Elliyan, Afifeh Michail Jiries Issa Mater, Ellen Issa Zakaria, Ruth Naomi Schut, and Roseileen Schut, introduced by Mr. CAIN, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purposes of the immigration and naturalization laws, Alice Ibrahim Hannan Ibrahim, Yacoub Mayous Muhannad Elliyan, Afifeh Michail Jiries Issa Mater, Ellen Issa Zakaria, Ruth Naomi Schut, and Roseileen Schut, shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this act, upon payment of the required visa fees and head taxes. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such aliens as provided for in this act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota officer to deduct the required number from the appropriate quota or quotas for the first year that such quota or quotas are available.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

The bill provides for the relief of six children who are refugees from the Palestine war. They were brought to this country in 1948 by Mrs. Dorothy J. Schut and her husband, now deceased, from an Arab village where all six were wandering half starved as homeless waifs. The Schuts brought the children to Yakima, in my State of Washington, after untold and unbelievable hardships, and together with their own three children have raised them as their own. In the 3 years that these children have lived for the first time in their lives in peace, security, and with enough to eat, they have developed from frightened, hopeless little wanderers into bright-eyed, happy, well-adjusted children. Mrs. Schut wants them to stay with her in America until they are grown and educated to be able to take care of themselves and to be able to share their knowledge and training with those in their homeland, where she plans eventually to return them, and to go herself to reestablish the orphanage she and her late husband founded in 1945 near Bethlehem and ran against superhuman odds for 3 years.

The children are in the United States on refugee permits and paroled to Mrs. Schut. Since 1948 she has been working to change the children's status. Time and again she has appealed the decisions of the Immigration Service and several times the Government has extended the children's paroles. The Government has now refused further extension, and unless this bill is passed, Mrs. Schut will travel 9,000 miles to return these children to a war-ridden country to face a tragic future.

The Immigration Service is not, from my study of the case, to be criticized for denying an extension of the children's paroles. The Immigration Service is doing only what the law requires.

My hope is that the Congress will recognize the extraordinary character of the case which involves these six children, and that an exception to the law will be granted.

These children are as close to her heart as her own. "These are my children," she said. "Jackie came to me when he was 2 days old; Ruthie, a few months. I have no wish to keep them in America, to rear them in luxury. I want to return them to their own people to share what they learn. And I want to go with them. But not yet. Not when there is war and poverty and misery in their own land and before they are ready to help their own. Give me 10 years. Give me time to raise these children whom I found as waifs. Let me send them to American schools, train them to be nurses, cooks, and mechanics. Then let me take them back to their homeland, living testimony to the greatness of America. Don't send these children now back to a land where Jew and Arab still fight and where these children will face death."

What more convincing testimony could we have than Mrs. Schut's appeal for permission to keep and raise these children in America than this? Testimony of her willingness to make happy, well-adjusted adults out of six tragic little souls whom she has saved and whom she plans in the future to return to their homeland, prepared to take their places in life and in their country which so sorely needs the kind of persons she is raising them to be.

The article from the Yakima Republic by Ray Ruppert is as follows:

BRAVE WOMAN BATTLES FOR REFUGEE CHILDREN

(By Ray Ruppert)

Uncle Sam wrote a short, although not unkind, letter to Mrs. Dorothy J. Schut, of Yakima, last week. He told her that the six refugee children she rescued 3 years ago from war and misery in Palestine must be returned to that unhappy land immediately.

The letter was neither unexpected nor welcome. If Mrs. Schut does what the letter says she must do, she will trek again 9,000 miles from Yakima to a village near Jerusalem. The worst she can expect there for her six waifs is death and the best is hunger and sickness and poverty.

THE SHADOW OF DEATH

Mrs. Schut is a brave woman. Many times she has passed through the valley of the shadow of death. She has not yet abandoned her 3-year tug-of-war with immigration authorities over the future of "her" children.

The situation is this: The six Palestinian children, ages 3 to 21, live with Mrs. Schut and her own children, Donna Mae, 12, and Alfred, 20, at 203 South Hillcrest Avenue.

Mrs. Schut's husband died a year and a half ago of tropical dysentery, contracted in Palestine.

The household is supported by Alfred, who works in a fruit warehouse, and by the help of friends who give Mrs. Schut fruit and vegetables and old clothing for the children.

Mrs. Schut brought the children into the United States from Palestine in 1948 as refugees from the bitter Arab-Israeli war then raging. They were to have visitor's permits, but in the confusion of war the children were admitted as refugees and paroled to Mrs. Schut. This meant the waifs could stay only until their h meland stabilized enough for them to return.

Since 1948 Mrs. Schut has been battling to change the children's status. Time and again she has appealed decisions of the Immigration Service and several times the Government has extended the refugee children's paroles.

Confronted now with a letter which appears to be Uncle Sam's last word, Mrs. Schut today is debating the wisdom of going to the Nation's Capital for a personal appeal from the apparently final unhappy decision of the Immigration Service.

What she can tell the authorities is this: "Give me 10 years. Give me time to raise these children whom I found as waifs. Let me send them to American schools, train them to be nurses and cooks and mechanics. Then let me take them back to Palestine, living testimony to the greatness of America. Don't send these children now back to a land where the Jew and Arab still fight and where these children will face death.

THESE, MY CHILDREN

"These are my children. Jackie came to me when he was two days old; he couldn't be closer to me if he were my own. Ruthie was with us since the time she was only a few months old. Roseileen and Nadiah and Alice and Helaniah are as close to me.

"I have no wish to keep them in America, to rear them in luxury. I want to return them to their own people, to share what they learn. And I want to go with them. But not yet. Not when there is war and poverty and misery in their land and before they are ready to help their own."

Probably she will tell the story as it began and as it happened.

The village of Beit Jala (bay jella) sits across the highway from Bethlehem, 6 miles from Jerusalem. The land is bare of trees and brings to mind the barren Yakima hills. In the summer, the sun burns, and in winter cold rain soaks the hills. There is no heat in the flat-topped, whitestone houses clustered on the hillside. The children grow up hungry, stomachs distended by malnutrition, lungs weakened by the wet cold of winter.

To this place came Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Schut in 1945 to found the Palestine Orphanage and Refugee Society. It was for them the beginning of a dream long delayed by World War II. When they came to Beit Jala, "it was like coming home," Mrs. Schut said. But they soon found in the people and the streets and the smells that they were in a far off land.

Life in Beit Jala was not easy. There were many children without homes or families. In time, the orphanage had 30 children of all ages, colors and sizes to care for. "We were new, we didn't know and we just went ahead," Mrs. Schut said. The orphanage took in infants, something other orphanages would not do.

Food was a problem. Mrs. Schut, reluctant to talk about those days for fear she will be misunderstood and thought a sympathy-seeker, can be drawn out. She said the rice they got wouldn't be pig food in this country. Before it was cooked, she picked out the match sticks, crumpled cigaret packs and things I won't mention." The flour, "when we had flour," was sifted through a fine screen. "That took out the big worms. The little ones just went through and we baked our bread."

Despite the handicaps, the orphanage did well. Mr. and Mrs. Schut were missionaries without a tie to any denomination. Donations from home kept them going and they were sustained by strong faith. They were sure they were under divine protection, that tomorrow's bread would come. Who can deny this faith, after hearing Mrs. Schut's story?

The orphans, the waifs, the unwanted lost the bow in their legs caused by malnutrition. Their limbs straightened and strengthened.

In the fall of 1947, the United Nations partitioned the Holy Land in hope of bringing peace between the Israelis and the Arabs. The partition deepened the hatred between the people.

"You could feel the tension grow day after day. You couldn't step out on your balcony without becoming a target for a bullet."

A curtain of fear and hate wrapped around the orphanage. The children could not travel the 6 miles to Jerusalem to school because a sudden curfew might leave them stranded away from home. Mr. Schut could not go abroad because his blond hair and blue eyes might lead the Arabs to think him a European Jew.

TRAPPED IN JERUSALEM

The fierce fighting between the Jews and Arabs, heated by the partition, boiled over when the British planned to withdraw their troops from the Holy Land. England had been holding Palestine under a League of Nations mandate for 30 years; the mandate ended on May 14. Months before that time, guerrilla war flared. There was no peace. No one knew his enemies or his friends.

Mrs. Schut and 18-year-old Helaniah, the eldest among the orphans, journeyed to Jerusalem on Easter of 1948 to complete papers at the American Consulate. An outburst of fighting cut the two women off in the Holy City for 4 days. They lived in a small, dark room in a Russian orthodox convent, next door to the headquarters of the Arab Legion.

Three artillery pieces mounted atop the legion headquarters barked and boomed through the night. Return fire from Jewish forces plunked into the convent walls. Mrs. Schut heard that the orphanage had been raided—that her husband and her son and all the children had been slain.

The Arabs overran Jewish settlements and the Israelis irregulars raided Arab towns. The people of the villages came to the orphanage and asked the Schuts if they could not take this boy or that girl, who belonged to their village, home for a holiday. In time, Mrs. Schut learned that the people of the village simply wanted to be together when they died. The village would be raided and the orphan, home for a holiday, would be among the victims.

So many things happened then that it is difficult to say which happened first. Mr. Schut became gravely ill with tropical dysentery. He became a burden on Mrs. Schut, already heavily laden with the care of nearly 30 orphans. It was decided that her husband and her daughter should return to the United States. Until she saw them again in Yakima half a year later, Mrs. Schut was not certain that they had not been killed before they left Palestine.

ARABS SPARE LIFE

They had a close call. Riding in a TWA station wagon to catch an airplane, Mr. Schut, Donna Mae, and an American newspaperman were engulfed suddenly by a band of roaming Arabs. The Arabs talked excitedly. Donna Mae, who speaks Arabic, began to cry.

"What are they saying, Donna Mae?" asked the newspaperman.

The girl sobbed, "They are going to kill us and take the car."

"Donna Mae," instructed her father, a calm person, "tell them that we will take them wherever they want to go, that we are going home to mama and that your daddy is very ill."

This appealed to the Arabs. They piled into the station wagon and asked to be taken to a battlefield; they were in a hurry to join the fighting.

Suspicion and fear and hate seeped through the land. Life was cheap and quickly taken. Mrs. Schut passed through an Arabian guard post without question. On her return, the guard had changed and strangers were at the gate. The Arabs were, in her words, "on me right now, with their knives ready to take me right there."

Mrs. Schut believed she was going to die. She said a prayer, a bit for herself but mostly for the orphan children at Beit Jala. Her murmured words were picked up by an Arab who took pride in the smattering of English he knew. He misunderstood her. He told his companions, "Let her go. Her skin's too tough."

The Arab States invaded Palestine on May 1, 2 weeks before the British were to pull out. The sniping, guerrilla fighting became open war. The American consulate at Jerusalem told Mrs. Schut that she should leave but she wouldn't abandon her orphans. Finally, she was ordered out for her own safety and to avoid any incidents involving an American citizen.

In the meantime, she had obtained (she thought) visitors permits for six children. Had she begun sooner she might have gotten permits for more children. As it was, she handed out the other orphans to families to care for and arranged to flee from Beit Jala.

They hired a Diesel truck, used for motor freight through the mountains. Providence was with them. The British delayed their departure by a day, just enough time for Mrs. Schut to take her party out first. After the Tommies pulled out, roads were mined, bridges blown up and escape impossible.

BULLETS HIT TRUCK

The truck rumbled out of Beit Jala on May 14 to begin an 8-hour trip that took 3½ days. The heavy vehicle lumbered along a hillside road to Jerusalem between battling Arabs and Israelis. A tarpaulin across the back of the truck was bullet-riddled. Mrs. Schut cradled Ruthie, age 9 months in her arms in the cab. In the back, Alfred flung his body across the waifs to protect them from the gunfire.

Running this gantlet of fire, the truck reached Jerusalem. The holy city was caught in the agony of battle. The Jewish militia, Haganah, fought the Transjordan legion in a house-to-house street fight. Mrs. Schut counted 300 bodies in the streets of Jerusalem as they passed through. They were not beyond the range of bullets until passing Jericho, they crossed the border into Transjordan.

At every village, they were stopped, searched, questioned, and their papers scrutinized. On the evening of the first day, they reached Amman and camped for the night. With them on the highway leading away from the fighting were 20,000 other refugees. The following night they reached Damascus and on the following day they came to the port city of Beirut, their goal.

In Beirut, Mrs. Schut found disappointment. The visitors' permits she had expected for her six orphans were not there. Something had happened to the papers, apparently, when the American consulate pulled out of Jerusalem for the sea coast. Nevertheless, times being hectic and dangerous, American officials at Beirut allowed her to proceed as if she had the permits.

There was a month in which to get a boat from Beirut to the United States. Providence being with them again, they obtained passage on a Greek freighter on the last day of their allotted month.

In the meantime, the eight people huddled in a one-room storehouse in Beirut while the early summer sun baked the city. Alfred suffered a slight sun stroke and a touch of dysentery.

Feeling ran high in Beirut between Jews and Arabs although the Lebanon city was outside the fighting area. Murders were not uncommon. A man was slain just outside the window of the room where the Schuts lived. "We heard it all."

Food was a nearly unsolvable problem. A sack of potatoes cost $37. The black market offered 100 pounds of rice for $120.

Mrs. Schut crossed her fingers when they boarded the Greek freighter. The children had been bitten and eaten by sand fleas so badly that she was afraid authorities might think the orphans had smallpox and forbid them to leave.

The freighter plowed through the Mediterranean to stand 3 miles offshore from a Greek port. It took on a cargo of high octane gasoline and set off on a 6 weeks' crossing of the Atlantic.

At New York, there were no visitor permits for the children. The Immigration Service paroled the six refugees to Mrs. Schut for 6 months under $500 bond apiece. A friend put up the $3,000 required.

And so they came to Yakima. They came here because, Mrs. Schut explained, the summer weather, the hills are so much like their home in Palestine and because she knew the valley.

Three of the children are in school. All have grown sturdy and strong. Jackie, a rotund, chubby little boy who will be 5 this month can remember so little about his homeland that the only boat he knows is not the one he crossed the ocean on but the one he rode on at the fair.

Will they stay in Yakima? Mrs. Schut hopes they will until the children are raised. She wants to return someday to Palestine with her "staff" to re-establish the orphanage at Beit Jala.

"I've been kicked and spit upon in the streets," she says of Palestine, "but still I love them. They are people. They need help."

"HE WILL CARE FOR ME"

She realizes that she cannot help them now, not while fear and war ride about the Holy City. But it is not for herself that she entreats Uncle Sam to stay his hand. She is thinking of the children who would go back to a land where a Jew is killed because he is a Jew, where an Arab is slain because he is an Arab, where food is beyond price and where there is no hope until peace finally comes.

Nor would she abandon the children, sending them back alone while she stays here. "They are mine," she says simply. Instead she will leave her daughter, Donna Mae, here and return with the war waifs.

In the last few days, Uncle Sam has given his final word: The children must go. But Mrs. Schut steadfastly hopes that the Immigration Service will delay its ruling and let the children remain until they can go home as examples of American training and education.

Perhaps the children think of this when they sing the "theme song" of the Schut home—"If the Father's eye is on the sparrow, surely He will care for me.

HARUE SATO

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill for the relief of Harue Sato, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the bill by me be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the explanatory statement presented by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 840) for the relief of Harue Sato, introduced by Mr. CAIN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. CAIN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

The bill is for the relief of Sgt. Franklyn Roff, a wounded veteran of the Korean War. Sergeant Roff had requested permission to marry his fiancée in Japan but was transferred to a hospital in the United States before the proper papers could be processed. This bill, if enacted, will make it possible for Sergeant Roff to have his fiancée brought to the United States so that he may marry her.

I believe that this is little enough to do for a man who has fought our war and has been wounded in our cause. I wish Sergeant Roff the best of luck, a speedy recovery, and a very happy married life with the woman of his choice.

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION PROVIDING REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND CERTAIN TERRITORIES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to provide representation in the electoral college for the District of Columbia and certain Territories of the United States, and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution and a statement by me explaining the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the joint resolution and statement presented by the Senator from South Dakota will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 31) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to provide representation in the electoral college for the District of Columbia and certain Territories of the United States, introduced by Mr. CASE, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purpose as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"In choosing the President and the Vice President of the United States, the District of Columbia, and each Territory of the United States entitled by law to select a delegate in the House of Representatives, shall be entitled to appoint, in such manner as the Congress may provide by law, one elector who shall possess the qualifications required by article II of the Constitution and whose ballot shall be cast and counted as provided by the twelfth article of amendment of the Constitution."

The statement presented by Mr. Case is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CASE

Today I am introducing a proposal for an amendment to the Constitution that would give upwards of 2,000,000 disfranchised citizens of the United States a chance to vote in Presidential elections.

The amendment would give to the District of Columbia and to Territories with a Delegate in the House of Representatives a vote in the electoral college.

There were approximately 800,000 people in the District of Columbia by the last census, the number retaining voting rights in their States being unknown. There were 499,794 in the Territory of Hawaii and 128,643 in the Territory of Alaska.

Hawaii and Alaska have the status of Territories and elect a Delegate to the House of Representatives. There are current proposals to provide the District of Columbia with a Delegate in the House of Representatives, but without amendment to the Constitution, they still would not vote on President.

There are pending, of course, proposals to give both Alaska and Hawaii full statehood. I happen to have voted for such a measure in the House of Representatives but I recognize that there is considerable doubt that either Territory will win statehood in the immediate future.

It has occurred to me that granting the Territories and the District of Columbia an opportunity to vote for President with representation in the electoral college might command the support of many Members of the Congress who oppose statehood. I believe these citizens of the United States should have a right to representation in the Congress and in the election of the President and Vice President. We draft their sons and we tax their incomes.

The proposed amendment is simple, and with the permission of the Senate, I place it in my remarks.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 2141. An act to extend for 2 years the existing privilege of free importation of gifts from members of the Armed Forces of the United States on duty abroad;

H. R. 2192. An act to amend section 313 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930; and

H. R. 2268. An act to authorize the payment of interest on series E savings bonds retained after maturity, and for other purposes.

INCREASE OF COMPENSATION TO VETERANS WITH SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, Senate bill 780, to authorize the payment by the Veterans' Administration of increased compensation on account of service-connected total deafness to veterans in receipt of compensation, was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I have conferred with the author of the bill, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and with his approval I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DECLARATION OF FRIENDSHIP FROM THE AMERICAN PEOPLE TO ALL OTHER PEOPLES

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address myself for 2 minutes to a concurrent resolution which I propose to submit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, it is a great tragedy that the Communists have stolen the word peace from the free nations of the world. That happens to be a fact, hard as it is for the average American to understand why it should be so.

Despite recent Soviet aggressions, the Communists have been very successful in selling the idea that the United States is a warmongering Nation while the Soviet Union wants peace. A recent Soviet outburst called us atomic barbarians.

The Communists have planted distrust of the United States and its allies over most of Asia and the Far East. A great many Europeans are in doubt about our peaceful intentions because of clever Communist propaganda.

Perhaps most dangerous of all is the fact that the Soviet Government is constantly telling the Russian people that the United States is a Nation of warmongers intent on their destruction. It is within our power to correct the record, and I believe we should.

I am now submitting a concurrent resolution, which I am proud to announce is being sponsored by 20 other Members of the Senate. The sponsors include Republicans and Democrats; this is in no sense a partisan issue. The sponsors joining with me are the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER].

The title of the concurrent resolution explains its purpose in simple language. It is called "A declaration of friendship from the American people to all other peoples of the world, including the peoples of the Soviet Union." A similar resolution is being submitted in the House of Representatives today, so that we may have an expression of the Congress.

The concurrent resolution sets forth in simple language what I sincerely and deeply believe to be a fact, namely, that the overriding desire of the American people is to bring about permanent peace. It declares that the United States Government stands ready at all times to compose its differences with the Soviet Government by honorable negotiation.

The resolution also calls upon the President of the United States to transmit the resolution to the Soviet Government with the request that its contents be made known to the Russian people.

The prestige of the Congress of the United States is very great throughout the world, because it represents the American people. I believe adoption of this resolution will set forth the true position of the United States in clear and unmistakable terms.

I submit the concurrent resolution and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 11), submitted by Mr. MCMAHON (for himself and other Senators), was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the goal of the American people is now, and ever has been a just and lasting peace; and

Whereas the deepest wish of our Nation is to join with all other nations in preserving the dignity of man, and in observing those moral principles which alone lend meaning to his existence; and

Whereas in proof of this, the United States has offered to share all that is good in atomic energy, asking in return only safeguards against the evil in the atom; and

Whereas this Nation has likewise given of its substance and resources to help those peoples ravaged by war and poverty; and

Whereas terrible danger to all free peoples compels the United States to undertake a vast program of armaments expenditures; and

Whereas we rearm only with reluctance and would prefer to devote our energies to peaceful pursuits: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Members of this Congress reaffirm the historic and abiding friendship of the American people for all other peoples, including the peoples of the Soviet Union, by declaring—

That the American people deeply regret the artificial barriers which separate them from the peoples of the U. S. S. R., and which keep the Soviet peoples from learning of America's desire to live in friendship with all other peoples, and to work with them in advancing the ideal of human brotherhood; and

That the American people desire neither war with the Soviet Union nor the terrible consequences of such a war; and

That although they are firmly determined to defend their freedom and security, the American people welcome all honorable efforts to compose the differences standing between them and the Soviet Government; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress request the President of the United States to call upon the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to acquaint the peoples of the Soviet Union with the contents of this resolution.

Mr. McMAHON. In this connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, an article entitled, "McMAHON's Plan To Express Amity Toward Russians Hailed," written by David Lawrence and published in the New York Herald Tribune of January 24, 1951; an article entitled, "A Bold Challenge to Joe Stalin," written by Thomas L. Stokes and published in the New York Herald Tribune of January 24, 1951; and an editorial entitled, "Nothing Against the Russian People," published in the Washington Post of January 25, 1951.

There being no objection, the articles and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of January 24, 1951]

McMAHON'S PLAN TO EXPRESS AMITY TOWARD RUSSIANS HAILED

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, January 23.—Senator BRIEN MCMAHON'S proposal of a resolution to be adopted by the Senate expressing friendship for the Russian people is the first sign of common sense that has come in a long while from officialdom here on the subject of moral force as a preventive of war.

The assumption that, because armament has to be increased substantially to meet outbreaks of aggression, all other forms of peaceful effort to prevent war need not be pressed is erroneous. Yet whenever military measures take the limelight these other methods of avoiding war seem to be sidetracked.

With two world wars to remind mankind that military conquest does not really bring peace, there have been equally erroneous assumptions current that military strength has become futile or unnecessary. The truth is that defense armament is indispensable, and so is an armament of reason and genuine friendship expressed by one set of peoples to the other.

THE CAUSES OF WAR

The Russian people are not bellicose by nature. They do not want war any more than do the people of the allied countries. Inasmuch as all peoples would prefer the ways of peace to armed hostilities, the real question always is why there should be any wars. Generally they result from the acts of a dictator or of a small group of men—oligarchies, they used to call them in ancient days—who exploit whole nations and force the young to go to war by inflaming public opinion against other countries.

There is no reason to believe that, if the minds of the 200,000,000 people of Soviet Russia could be reached with genuine evidences of friendship, the rulers of the Communist regime would have the power to take the steps of aggression which have now brought the world to the brink of war.

Like all other moves of this kind—and they are by no means novel—the question of methods and means arises. The United States has brought forth what is known as the Voice of America program. This project was for a long time in need of funds, but now has the money from Congress. What is lacking is the ideas that must go into such an undertaking to make it successful. Those ideas cannot begin and end on the bureaucratic level. They must come from the very top level of our policy makers. They must be part of national and international policy.

Today the Voice of America is just one of a number of bureaus in the State Department. It ought to be an important agency independent of any department and reporting directly to the President. It should have enough prestige to command the sympathetic support of Members of both Houses of Congress. It should be the public relations instrument of the government itself in international relations. Few men who have been at the head of the State Department have ever been qualified to do this type of planning even if they had the time to devote to it.

But to occupy so important a role, the project must have Cabinet-level ranking and must be composed of advisers who are able to suggest major policies that will appeal to other nations, especially those behind the iron curtain. Strange, indeed, that nobody has put any official momentum behind the idea of a formal expression of friendship by the Congress addressed to the people of Soviet Russia or that other moves which can appeal to peoples behind the iron curtain should not have come before now from authoritative quarters.

MUST CAPTURE IMAGINATION

The Voice of America can relay messages and broadcast interesting scripts and carry a polemic technique to counteract Communist propaganda, but that's not enough. There must be ways to capture the imagination of the Russian people. That's why the suggestion by Senator McMAHON is likely to prove more penetrating than all the high-sounding speeches of diplomatic phraseology that come forth so regularly as the only expression of American idealism.

But will such policies of friendship and other proposals get through to the people behind the iron curtain? The answer is that any event of sensational importance percolates through any man-made barrier. The persons who go and come across the border from the satellite states to the free world are constantly discussing these same issues. Word-of-mouth distribution of ideas still remains the most effective single instrument of communication the world has ever known.

A BOLD CHALLENGE TO JOE STALIN—SENATOR MCMAHON WOULD CENTER ATTACK ON THE IRON CURTAIN

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

WASHINGTON.—It is good that in the gathering storm one man is willing to stand up boldly and appeal for another attempt to break through the iron curtain so that our people, as people, might speak to the Russian people, as people, for understanding and peace.

For this Senator BRIEN MCMAHON, Democrat, Connecticut, would use both our Senate and the United Nations as instrumentalities.

No man is more entitled to speak—and be heard. The Connecticut Senator knows whereof he speaks, and is conscious of his tremendous responsibility. He is a man with a burden on his soul. As chairman of the Joint Congressional Atomic Energy Committee he lives daily, so to speak, with the awful weapon that could wipe out civilization. He realizes also another bitter truth that history teaches—that arms races such as that in which the United States and Russia are engaged can end only in wars.

UN OUTLET IN RUSSIA

To challenge Joe Stalin and the rulers of the Kremlin on the iron curtain he proposes:

1. That the United Nations assert its rights to have its deliberations known behind the iron curtain—as a minimum by operating its own radio station in Russia.

2. That the Senate pass a resolution expressing friendship for the people of Russia by the people of the United States and otherwise declaring the intentions of our own people for peace and for honorable negotiations for peace, and that the Soviet Government be asked to circulate this among its own people. To reinforce its effect he would have the resolution circulated all over this country and signed by our people.

The Senator was impelled to speak out because of developing circumstances. He has become alarmed by the headway Russia has made with her continuous propaganda that the United States wants war and that our people are warmongers. He knows, as we all know, that this is not so—that, as he said, no Member of the United States Senate wants war, nor do any of our people. Nor, he adds, do the people of Russia.

OUR STORY HIDDEN

But we have not got our story across. As regards Russia, we are stopped by the iron curtain so that we cannot reach the people. As for other people, particularly in Asia, we have failed to get our story to them and to let them know of our interest, from our national experience, in their aspirations to shake off colonialism and run their own affairs as independent nations. Yet we know what they want better than any other people.

The Senator simply would challenge Joe Stalin by asking him "that the free peoples' views be circulated among the Russians as the Soviet's views are circulated among us." As the Senator was speaking, our press wires, for example, were carrying the latest diatribe against the United States as "warmongers"—in this instance, by Peter Pospelov at the Lenin anniversary celebration.

STRONGEST WEAPON

The Senator is not sanguine that Stalin would accept either the UN or Senate proposal; but he is convinced, he said, "that if we focus world opinion on the iron curtain and expose it as a fraud and a menace to world peace, we may convert this barrier against truth into a Soviet liability.

The barrier against truth, the Senator explained, "may be the Soviet's strongest weapon.

"Perhaps we cannot convince the Kremlin rulers to open up the curtain, but I am absolutely certain that we can cripple and perhaps silence the Soviet propaganda guns in the western world. People can see through a fraud very easily when it is exposed to them."

Except for the iron curtain, he declared, "I am sure that ordinary Russians would invoke their wrath on rulers who deny them life's barest necessities and who saddle them with crushing armament expenditures."

As an inducement to peace to people everywhere, the Senator reintroduced his resolution of last February calling for a reduction of armaments, including atomic weapons, by an iron-clad international agreement providing for inspection. The money thus saved would be pooled and applied to build up backward nations.

His threefold program is simple, direct, bold, and possible—that is, if we really want to save ourselves and the world.

[From the Washington Post of January 25, 1951]

NOTHING AGAINST THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

There ought to be more attention paid to the suggestion of Connecticut's Senator BRIEN MCMAHON, that the people of Russia should be assured of the continued friendship of the people of the United States.

No, that is not appeasement. In a way it is just the opposite of appeasement, because it draws a sharp line between the people of Russia and the present Government of Russia.

The people of Russia are continually bombarded with Soviet lies to the effect that the people of the United States hate them and seek to do them ill. If some semblance of the truth can penetrate behind the iron curtain—and there are leaks in that curtain despite all vigilance—it would produce a very different attitude in the mind of the average Russian.

What Senator MCMAHON is really proposing is that we should approach this international problem with some of the skill that the Russians themselves have shown in using propaganda as a means of bolstering their side. The ordinary American must be thinking somewhat sadly that since the close of World War II Soviet Russia has made enormous advances by just such methods and without the loss—so far as we know—of a single Russian life. Meantime our boys are dying on the battlefields of Korea while in the matter of world public opinion we seem to be losing ground instead of gaining it.

It is time that we made some effort to cause the real truth to penetrate behind the iron curtain and thus to beat Russia at her own game. For what Senator MCMAHON proposes is the simple truth. Nobody in this country hates the Russians as such, nobody has ill will against them as Russians and all of the furore in this country against communism is based solely on the evil deeds of a Russian Communist dictatorship.

We should not be misled into believing that the crooks and terrorists now in power in Moscow are any more typical of the Russian people as a whole, than the dope peddlers now being rounded up in New York City are typical of the American people.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may address myself to the concurrent resolution for 2 or 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for 2 or 3 minutes—the Chair will make it 3.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am happy to join in cosponsorship of the resolution offered today by the able senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] expressing the deep longing of the American people for peace and expressing their friendship with the rank and file people of the Soviet Union.

I congratulate my colleague on the very sound reasoning of his approach. I trust that the text of this eloquent resolution will be relayed effectively to the peoples of the world.

There is an old hymn which reads as follows:

Make channels for the streams of love,
Where they may broadly run;
And love has overflowing streams,
To fill them every one.

But if at any time we cease
Such channels to provide,
The very founts of love for us
Will then seem parched and dried.

For we must share, if we would keep
That blessing from above;
They cease to have who cease to give;
Such is the law of love.

Mr. President, we have tried nearly everything in the world for peace except the thing which is embodied in the concurrent resolution. The United States Senate is expressing the hope of the people of this country when it agrees to this resolution.

There is absolutely no reason why the man on the street or on the farm in America should have the slightest desire in the world to inflict harm on the man on the street or on the farm in Russia or its satellite states. On the contrary, all human beings, whether they live unfortunately behind the iron curtain or whether they enjoy the blessings of western freedom, have the same wants and desires, the same fundamental longing to live in peace with their neighbors and to enjoy freedom and security for themselves and their loved ones.

It is only the power-hungry leaders of the Soviet Union who have brought about the recent tragic chain of circumstances which finds United Nation boys killing Chinese and Northern Korean boys on the frozen battlefields of that distant peninsula. Moreover, the responsibility for any future aggravating the present situation rests solely on the leaders of the Soviet Union.

We of the west desire peace; we will strive for peace, and move heaven and earth to try to maintain peace. We despise war. We know that war would settle nothing. It would not end communism; it would only bring on more hunger, more disease, more chaos, more confusion, and more suffering to the humble people of the world.

There is no good reason for war. War is not inevitable. On the contrary, peace is very definitely attainable if the leaders of the Soviet will simply recognize the facts that—

First. We of the west will be prepared for every possible contingency, but Second. We of the west will join in seeking any reasonable and lasting settlement founded on deeds of justice, rather than mere words.

We will not appease, but neither will we provoke. We will not place our faith in armament alone, but neither will we strip ourselves of the arms necessary for defense. We will not change our attitude of love and friendship toward the humble people of the earth, even though they live in aggressor countries. But neither will we change our attitude toward defense of the heritage of which we are the trustee.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate will promptly adopt this splendid resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Connecticut and his associates.

STUDY OF ADMINISTRATION OF TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 72), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is directed to make a full and complete study of the administration of the Trading With the Enemy Act with respect to the assets of foreign countries and nationals thereof and to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of such study together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ on a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

EXTENSION OF TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BREWSTER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 1612) to extend the authority of the President to enter into trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF STUDIES OF ISSUANCE OF INJUNCTION IN LABOR DISPUTES BY STATE COURTS (S. DOC. NO. 7)

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, pursuant to Senate Resolution 140, Eighty-first Congress, and the approval of the Senate Rules Committee, the Senate Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, in 1950, commissioned four universities to make studies of the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes by State courts. Our agreements with the universities provided that the subcommittee would not in any way attempt to influence the findings of the universities. The studies have now been completed, have been received and approved by the Senate Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, and by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. By direction of the committee, I ask unanimous consent that these studies on State injunctions be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEE ON FINANCE TO SUBMIT REPORTS DURING RECESS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance may, during the recess of the Senate, be permitted to file reports on two bills, one being H. R. 1, to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, and the other (H. R. 1724) to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committee.

AMERICAN HEART WEEK AND NEGRO HISTORY WEEK—VOICE OF AMERICA PROGRAM—PROCLAMATIONS OF GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two proclamations by the Governor of New York State, the first proclaiming the week of February 11 to 18 as American Heart Week and Negro History Week, and the second proclamation is to be included in the Voice of America program to the oppressed peoples of the world.

There being no objection, the proclamations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCLAMATION

The toll of death in our State and our country from diseases of the heart and blood vessels continues to rise in tragic fashion. This constitutes a major menace to the public health at any time and in any year. Right now, when we are in the throes of drastic mobilization for self-defense, the problem becomes more serious than ever.

We have to realize that more people die of heart diseases than of the next five leading causes of death combined. We are faced with the ominous fact that cardiovascular diseases threaten to impair our national manpower reserve.

The State of New York and its people have embarked upon an intensive program for coping with heart disease both by dint of the research being carried on in nine medical schools and by the research projects of the State Health Department for applying new knowledge to the treatment of heart disease. Last year New York State took the leadership by providing State funds for the establishment of a Chronic Disease Research Institute at Buffalo, in cooperation with the Medical School of the University of Buffalo. Heart disease is one of the principal elements being studied at this Institute.

We are also carrying on demonstrations in attempts to control rheumatic fever in children by the use of some of the new drugs and antibiotics. Rheumatic fever in children leads to serious heart disease among adults. We are making serious efforts to curb this ailment by controlling it at an early age.

The efforts of the State in this direction have the invaluable help of private organizations, outstanding among which are the American Heart Association and its affiliates. In order to call the attention of the public as dramatically as possible to the urgent needs of the 1951 Heart Fund, the Heart Associations will celebrate February 11 to 18 as American Heart Week. This campaign deserves the utmost possible support.

Now, therefore, I, Thomas E. Dewey, Governor of the State of New York, do hereby proclaim the week of February 11 to 18, 1951, as American Heart Week in the State of New York and I call upon the schools, churches, scientific bodies, civic associations and other organizations, as well as the generous people of New York, to cooperate to the limit of their abilities.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the State at the capitol in the city of Albany this 31st day of January in the year of our Lord 1951.

By the Governor:

THOMAS E. DEWEY.

Attest:

JAMES C. HAGGERTY,
Secretary to the Governor.

PROCLAMATION

I am happy to be able to say that today there is so much concrete evidence of outstanding progress in the position of American Negroes in our State and our economy. I am particularly proud that much of this progress can be directly traced to the passage of our law against discrimination in employment, in which the State of New York took the lead.

We are now in the sixth year of the administration of that law which has ceased to be an experiment in social legislation and has become a real instrument for social progress as well as a model for seven other States. During the past 12 months we passed the second anniversary of the effective date of the New York State Fair Educational Practices Act, also a pioneer law in the United States. We passed another milestone last year when the Austin-Wicks bill, prohibiting segregation and discrimination in both public and publicly subsidized private housing, went into effect.

On June 5, 1950, the Supreme Court of the United States outlawed the segregation of passengers on the basis of color in railroad cars. This legal decision on a national level followed the success of the New York State Commission Against Discrimination in persuading the Pennsylvania Railroad to abandon the practice of segregating Negro passengers on trains from New York City to points south. Furthermore, the principal railroads of the State of New York have announced that their employment policy no longer confines Negroes to menial occupations. The New York State Commission Against Discrimination also announces that opportunities for Negroes have been considerably expanded in the white collar and clerical fields.

We obtained another notable victory for freedom, equality and decency when the American Bowling Congress voted to rescind that section of its constitution which restricted membership to members of the Caucasian race. This followed the action of Attorney General Goldstein when he filed legal proceedings against the American Bowling Congress in the State of New York. Many private agencies—Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish—added their voices to this effort. Legal and educational steps were also taken in Ohio, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

All this does not mean that prejudice and injustice towards Negro fellow citizens have come to an end. We still face the need of vast improvement. But the facts I have recited clearly indicate that we are on our way in this vital domain of human relations and the progress we have attained is worth recording.

Now, therefore, I, Thomas E. Dewey, Governor of the State of New York, do hereby proclaim February 11 through February 18 as Negro History Week in New York State and I call upon the people of the entire State, regardless of their color, to cooperate with Negro organizations and individuals in the observance of the spirit of this proclamation.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the State at the capitol in the city of Albany this 1st day of February in the year of our Lord 1951.

By the Governor:

THOMAS E. DEWEY.

Attest:

JAMES C. HAGERTY,
Secretary to the Governor.

SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE YALTA AGREEMENT—STATEMENT BY SENATOR IVES

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, yesterday marked the sixth anniversary of the Yalta agreement. In this connection I have prepared a statement, the text of which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement of Mr. IVES was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR IVES

Yesterday, February 7, marked the sixth anniversary of a black and disgraceful page in the history of American foreign policy. On that day in 1945 was concluded at the Yalta Conference an agreement, to which our Nation was a party, and by which our national honor was betrayed and our Government sold out our friends and allies over many years for a mess of Soviet pottage.

This agreement did not represent the will of the American people or the will of their representatives in Congress. It was never submitted to the Congress for approval. The Congress was not even consulted about it. It serves as an appalling example of what can occur when the Chief Executive usurps too much authority.

As victims of this betrayal, the people of Poland have suffered untold hardship and anguish. And yet, their freedom gone, persecuted and tormented by the merciless hordes of Soviet Russia, they still carry on undaunted, determined to be free. Their heroic attitude provides a mighty inspiration to the remaining free nations of the world in this dark hour when freedom everywhere is in peril.

The terrible plight of the Polish people also provides a constant tragic reminder of our Government's duplicity and irresponsibility. If our Nation ever had an obligation, it is our obligation to right the wrongs committed by our representatives at Yalta. We meet this obligation at the earliest possible moment.

In the meantime, with the knowledge that they have the deep sympathy of the American people and that the American people strongly desire to rectify the wrongs thus perpetrated, the people of Poland should take renewed courage and acquire renewed faith that the day will come again when they will be independent and free.

ROSH HASHANA, THE JEWISH NEW YEAR—EXCERPT FROM ADDRESS BY RABBI MAXWELL H. DUBIN

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, because of its importance, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a condensed version of a talk delivered by Rabbi Maxwell H. Dubin, Wilshire Boulevard Temple, before the congregation on Rosh Hashana—the Jewish New Year. This discussion, forwarded to me by Mr. Harry M. Warner, president of Warner Bros. pictures of New York, was given on September 12, 1950, and is a frank portrayal of the dangers of communism here and abroad. It should serve as a warning in our future relations with Soviet Russia.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONDENSED VERSION OF TALK DELIVERED BY RABBI MAXWELL H. DUBIN, WILSHIRE BOULEVARD TEMPLE, BEFORE THE CONGREGATION ON ROSH HASHANA—THE JEWISH NEW YEAR

Last night we ushered in the New Year. In Jewish life this period is called the Yomin Neroim, the awesome days; the days when the fate of the individual, so Jewish tradition tells us, is determined by God for the entire year.

It seems to me that there is a Yomin Neroim atmosphere, an awesome days' atmosphere for the entire civilized world today, but the fate of all civilization lies in the balance trembling, and mankind is awaiting the decision.

Now, this is not the place and there is not time to detail all the mistakes that the democratic nations and peoples made during the past 5 years since the war ended. But I do want to consider with you one of them, because it is the crux of the problem.

The first and the most fatal error that the democratic world made, was our absolute failure to understand the true meaning of communism and the real aims and ambitions of Soviet Russia. We were led to believe in America that communism was a forward-looking social movement, led by great idealists who had a high code of social and international morality. We were sold the idea that Soviet Russia was a civilized country, determined to direct its international life in paths of peace and of progress. We were told that Soviet Russia had a government that would have respect for law and order, that would have respect for its international promises and commitments and would devote its best interests to the welfare of its own people and to the peoples of other lands.

We Jews knew from the outset that all those statements and claims made by Soviet Russia were not true. We Jews knew the truth about the Communists and about Soviet Russia and we knew it through years of bitter experience and pain and blood and suffering and terrible horrors. We paid a bitter price for that knowledge. We know that the Jews of Russia, the millions of Jews who lived there when the revolution took place were the first ones to be liquidated by the Communists. They were sent to labor camps, they dug the canals, they were sent out to Siberia, and they died—by the hundreds of thousands—because the thing for which the Jew stood and stands—respect for human individuality—was not and is not wanted by Soviet Russia.

We knew the truth, but no one listened to us. When the Jews, during the rise of the Nazis, told the world that the burning of those synagogues in Germany was only a prelude to that which eventually led to the bombing of Westminster Abbey and the other English churches, nobody listened to us. So no one listened to the Jew when he warned the world against the aims and the ambitions of Soviet Russia. We warned the world even during the honeymoon period when Russia was working with us, not an ally—she never was an ally—we just happened to have had the same common enemy, that's all; we warned the world to be careful and to be wary, but no. We were just a voice crying in the wilderness. So Russia was treated by the nations of the world like a spoiled child that threatens to hold its breath if it does not get what it wants. We accepted her word, we had faith in her signature, faith in the agreements that were made. And what was the result? We are facing it now. Russia violated every promise to the western world. She abused our trust, spread her power, seized lands, destroyed governments, developed fifth columns throughout the world and poisoned the minds of millions of peoples against their native governments.

Well, 5 years too late, we of America realize and the world realizes the bitter mistake that was made. We have to rid ourselves, to rid every aspect of our lives, social and political and industrial and economic, of the Communist infiltration.

So we are at the brink of momentous days, you and I. The destiny of a world is in the scales and no one can tell of a certainty what is going to happen.

Officially, we are not at war because Congress has not said there is a war. But, factually, there is a war at this moment. There is a war, Russian-inspired, Russian-led, Russian-equipped, in Korea. Right now on Rosh Hashana morning when I am talking to you, boys of this congregation—I know of two who are at this moment in battle with the marines in Korea—American boys are dying, newspapers are carrying casualty lists, homes are being broken, hearts of parents are being torn. Reserves are being called.

We are at war; and that war is being waged on two fronts. I am not concerned so much about the war in Korea if it does not spread, and, please God, it may not spread. That does not worry me very much because I know that that front is going to be cleaned up before long. But there is another front, the home front, and that front worries me. Because on this home front war has been declared on us by Soviet Russia. And that has to concern us. And it has to concern every man, woman, and child in America. Because you see, my friends, the whole character of war has changed. Wars are no longer fought only on the battlefield; and wars are fought not only by men, and yes, even women in uniform. You and I who are not in uniform, you and I today are just as much in the service as though we actually wore a uniform. Wars today are fought at home. Wars are fought in the laboratories, wars are fought in the factories. That is where Russia has declared war upon us. Her aim is to paralyze, her aim is to sabotage, her aim is to slow down the work that we in America are trying to do in order to prepare ourselves for the ordeal.

In the days ahead you and I have to be on guard, very much on guard, because attempts have been made and attempts will be made to befog the issue. You are going to be asked to sign all kinds of protests and all kinds of proclamations. Be careful. Know what you are doing; and if you do not know, ask. There are Government agencies to enlighten you.

Remember that this terrible scourge that we call communism must be stopped wherever we are going to meet it. And in that connection we have a twofold duty, you and I. We have a duty to our country, to America, and we have a duty to our faith, to Judaism, and to our coreligionists as Jews, and to all faiths, whatever they may be.

I returned recently from 3 months abroad. You have heard Americans returning from abroad recite the trite, the very trite words, but nonetheless true words, that America is the best, the most fortunate land in the world. And it is. Both materially and spiritually, there is not another land in the world as fortunate as America. The best proof of that is that people everywhere abroad, no matter where one goes, want to come to America.

Everyone wants to come here, and few people want to leave America. Your best proof of that is that whenever a Communist agent is ordered to be deported from America to Europe listen to the fuss that he makes about going back to his paradise of a homeland. He doesn't want to leave; he wants to remain here.

Now, here in America labor is better protected and better treated than anywhere else in the world, even in Socialist England. Labor enjoys more governmental benefits in America than it enjoys in Socialist England. That irks Russia, because Russia is supposed to be the fatherland of the proletariat. Russia is supposed to be the land where the working people have everything—Russia, and not America. Therefore, Russia does not like us. For that reason every person who loves America, every person who makes a living here, every person who enjoys the way of life that is America, must protect it in the danger that now faces it.

As for the Jews, let us not forget this, my friends: That wherever Communist Russia has come to power, Jewish life has been destroyed. There is not a vestige of Jewish religious, economic, social, or cultural life left in Russia today, not a vestige. And even in Moscow the Yiddish daily, Heint, which was nothing but a Yiddish translation of Pravda, has been eliminated. Yiddish writers have been sent out to Siberia. There is not a vestige of Jewish life in Russia today. And those few Jews who have been able to steal out from behind the iron curtain in Europe—from Rumania and Hungary and Czechoslovakia, and all the rest of the Balkan countries—they tell us that the last traces of Jewish life are being eliminated behind the iron curtain by the Communists.

Now, remember this, should—God forbid—the horrible thing happen and communism spread its influence over this country, then I say to you that the American Jewish community, which is today the largest, the most influential, the most powerful Jewish community in the world, will go down and will be destroyed even as have been the Jewish communities of Europe.

Therefore, for these reasons, we must be on guard. We must pledge ourselves to wipe out communism wherever and whenever we find it, even if it means cutting deep into our own family and social circles. My friends, there was in Jewish life, particularly amongst the orthodox Jews in days gone by, a weapon that was used to control the community. It is a weapon which, of course, we of the liberal Jewish group do not have and never have had, but it was a weapon in Jewish life. It was a weapon that was so horrible that even those who watched its being inflicted in the synagogue, were terror-stricken, not to speak of the one who was subjected to that weapon. It was called the charem, excommunication. So we today must take a page out of the book of those old Jews and apply that same weapon, that same punishment today, the punishment of excommunication, of ostracism, of complete isolation from the community of any Jew who has become infected with the Communist virus.

The fate of humanity is lying in the balance and the slightest hair may tip those scales in one direction or another. It is a fact, a fact that faces you, and you, and you, and me every moment of our existence today.

So we pray for life this morning. We pray that God may inscribe us, and inscribe our dear ones, and inscribe the world in the Book of Life. But there can be no certainty of life, there can be no certainty of a future for any of us if this dread thing continues to go on. It will affect you, and you, and you, and every single member of your family and mine. So we pray to God this morning for life. We pray that this catastrophe may be averted, that untold millions of people may not be condemned to death through the horrors of another war. Grant us, then, O God, Thy protection. Grant that this year that we have ushered in, may be for us and for all humanity, a year of life and not of death, a year of peace and not of war, a year of happiness and not of misery. Amen.

TAXATION AND REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES—EDITORIAL FROM THE RICHMOND NEWS-LEADER AND STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial from the Richmond News-Leader of February 6, 1951, the title of which is "$10,000,000,000 cart, $71,000,000,000 horse."

I believe this editorial very graphically presents the situation with respect to increasing taxes before reducing nondefense expenditures.

To follow this editorial, I ask that a statement made by me on February 4 likewise be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEN BILLION DOLLAR CART, $71,000,000,000 HORSE

Mr. Truman's $10,000,000,000 tax program, as it was outlined yesterday to the House Ways and Means Committee, leaves a great deal to be desired. Clearly, the President has in mind a plan to tax first and spend later; Congress would do better, in our view, to wait awhile before putting so monstrous a cart before so intangible a horse. Not until the recommended budget has been stripped of at least $7,000,000,000 in nonessential spending should the Congress give its approval to new tax legislation. The world will not come to an end if we wait to look at the menu before paying our check.

Once the budget has been boiled down by committee action to a more realistic figure, the question of a tax increase can be considered. When that time comes, the first aim should be to close loopholes in existing tax law—in short, to abolish the outrageous privileges of oil and mining interests, to bring tax-exempt cooperatives into the fold, to tighten up rigorously on others who are getting a relatively free ride. Secondly, the necessary tax increases should be designed to obtain some direct revenue from millions of persons in low and moderate income brackets who now escape direct Federal taxation almost altogether. A $100 reduction in the individual exemptions under income tax law would enroll 5,000,000 new taxpayers who would contribute an estimated $240,000,000 without overwhelming personal hardship. Finally, other necessary tax increases should be spread as equitably as possible over the entire economy. A Federal sales tax seems to us the best answer to the problem.

This newspaper has insisted steadfastly, since the Korean War began, that the Nation's taxes must be increased so that we can pay as we go, to the very limit of our endurance, for the preparedness effort. The sacrifices demanded by high taxes are infinitely preferable to the prospect of currency collapse and national bankruptcy. But personal taxes already have been hiked by 17 percent; corporation taxes have been increased sharply, and an excess profits tax law has been reestablished. There are some indications that these amendments in tax law will produce substantially higher revenue than the Treasury had predicted. At any rate, the Government's need for immediate cash is not as urgent as it was 4 months ago.

It follows that this is a time for taking stock. One mistake was made in December in the enactment of an excess profits tax which will cause endless difficulty in administration; if further mistakes can be avoided, let us avoid them now. For our own part, we raise no special objections to the proposed across-the-board increase of four percentage points in individual income taxation, but the recommended boosts in excise taxes seem excessive. A tax of 20 percent on automobiles and 25 percent on household appliances should be considered carefully. The requested increases in whiskey, beer and cigarette taxes may prove more than these golden geese can survive, but the point is one for tax experts to decide; as luxury commodities, these items assuredly should be taxed right to the point of diminishing returns. Again, it seems to us that a sweeping Federal sales tax would prove fairer and more desirable than heavy increases in selected fields.

But we do not wish to leave any impression of opposition to higher taxes in general. With the best will in the world, Congress cannot cut the swollen Federal budget to a point where present revenue laws will cover the inflated costs of national defense. Mr. Truman has requested Congress to levy taxes "'til it hurts." Added taxes will hurt, and we can only pray that the confiscation of more than a quarter of national income for the expenses of government will not cause irreparable damage to the economy. Sooner or later, as a new tax bill is drawn up, the time will come for separating the men from the boys. And if that day brings an additional tax of 15 cents on every 10 gallons of gasoline, or 30 cents more on a carton of cigarettes, or 60 cents more on a fifth of whisky, let us grouch and grumble and howl to our heart's content—but let us pay it in the grim realization that far worse sacrifices could be demanded of us all.

To pass a quickie tax bill of $10,000,000,000 to be followed by another, as requested by the President, would be a most unwise procedure.

Two so-called quickie tax bills have already been enacted in the past several months. The Treasury estimates that the tax take will be increased from $37,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1950 to $55,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1952, even if no further tax increases are enacted.

We have taken off the fat. Further huge tax increases will dig deeply into the lean meat and possibly into the very bone structure of our economy unless they are eased by elimination of nonessential expenditures.

General Eisenhower has warned that our war-alert status may last 20 or 30 years. We must husband our financial strength and tighten our belts for the long struggle ahead.

The country is entitled to a firm financial program from the administration instead of piece-meal quickies. Our financial preparedness cannot be attained by piece-meal implementation such as the President proposes.

It is essential to pay as we go, but the people of the United States will not accept huge tax increases in good spirit unless they are accompanied by:

1. The closing of all loop holes in existing tax laws;

2. Improved tax assessment and collection system to prevent tax evasion; and

3. Elimination of every dollar of nonessential spending.

ECONOMIES UNDER THE HOOVER RECOMMENDATIONS—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SENATOR LODGE AND HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as Senate author of the Lodge-Brown Act which created the Hoover Commission, I recently wrote to former President Hoover asking him to state the economies which could be effected by carrying out the remaining recommendations of the Hoover Report. Mr. Hoover estimates that total savings of over $5,000,000,000 could be achieved. I believe this estimate is, if anything, conservative, and I hope that the members of the Appropriations Committee in particular will read this correspondence and put into effect all of the true economies which it recommends. I ask unanimous consent that my letter and Mr. Hoover's response be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 8, 1951.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This inquiry is addressed to you as the former Chairman of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government.

We shall soon be asked to raise additional taxes to finance the expanse of our defense efforts. This will focus, more than ever before, public attention on the need for economic and effective Government. I therefore ask you:

1. How much of your Commission's recommended changes, innovations, and reorganizations remain yet to be accomplished?

2. What is your estimate of the dollar savings to be expected if these remaining recommendations are carried out?

As Senate author of the act establishing the Commission, I have a continuing interest in this whole subject and wish to do all I can to promote its reports. May I have your permission to use your reply in connection with my efforts on behalf of this objective?

With kind personal regards,

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.,
United States Senator.

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 26, 1951.

The Honorable HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: I have your letter of January 8. Your continued interest in the Commission, created under the Lodge-Brown Act, is most gratifying.

The opening sessions of the Eighty-second Congress offer an opportune time to consider again the proposals of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. International circumstances now require that this program to achieve efficiency and economies in the Federal Government be brought to fulfillment.

Much has already been achieved in the field of Government reform. The Eighty-first Congress approved 20 public laws and 26 reorganization plans, embodying recommendations of the Commission. These, together with administrative actions taken within the executive branch, mean that nearly 50 percent of the Commission's recommendations have been authorized. The attached Report to the American People, prepared by the Citizens Committee for Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Government, details these reforms.

Savings from those reforms already authorized should eventually approach $2,000,000,000 annually, according to estimates of the Commission's task forces. Those recommendations not yet adopted should provide additional savings of similar proportions. These savings estimates were based upon a $40,000,000,000 budget. A budget of $70,000,000,000 could well increase certain items in these estimated savings pro rata. Although it is difficult to estimate such increases without complete research, it would not be unreasonable to hope that full enactment and faithful execution of the recommendations could bring total savings of over $5,000,000,000 to the Nation's taxpayers. It must be realized, however, that such vast changes take time.

The full savings and efficiencies from the work of the Commission can be accomplished. However, there must be acceptance of three fundamental responsibilities:

First, the responsibility of Congress: The report of the Commission on Organization was a complete plan for the orderly organization of Government. Even those portions of the plan now in effect will not yield the maximum benefits as long as some other integral parts are missing. Remaining recommendations, applying to both specific and general aspects of the Government, require enactment by the Congress.

Second. The responsibility of the executive branch. Savings do not automatically follow passage of a law. Savings follow only upon skillful and vigorous application of reforms. Federal officials and employees must (a) demonstrate a desire to install the reforms and save the money, and (b) demonstrate skill and talent in applying those reforms. In the final instance, of course, the degree of Federal efficiency and economy is dependent upon the officials and employees of the executive branch.

Third. The responsibility of the citizens. Active citizen interest and demand for better Government must continue. Public momentum behind Federal reform is the key to action. Constant citizen attention must be focused on the problems of Federal management. It must be expressed through an ever-vigilant Congress. Otherwise, the value of the reforms will atrophy.

Administrative economies may seem small by contrast with necessary huge increases in Federal expenditures for defense. Actually, the potential economies suggested by the Commission reside only partly in the realm of measurable dollars and cents. Over the long run, better administrators, working with up-to-date methods within a sound organizational structure, are found to do a more efficient, and hence a more economical, job.

This points up the necessity for prompt action on the Commission's remaining recommendations. Among these first priority must be given to proposals for better personnel management. The need for attracting and holding capable administrative, scientific, and specialized personnel has been greatly accentuated by the emergency. As the Commission said: "High caliber executives can eliminate cumbersome and wasteful forms of management." No matter how good a watch is, someone must wind it.

Among the other vital reforms ahead are these: (1) Consolidation of present overlapping, duplicative, and wasteful Federal activities in water resources development and other public works, and the provision of adequate review and supervision for all projects; (2) reorganization of the Veterans' Administration in order to provide more effective and economical service to our increasing numbers of veterans, particularly with respect to life insurance; (3) centralization of policy determinations and of supervision for the expanding Federal medical programs in order to permit full utilization of our limited facilities, both private and public, and, at the same time, to conserve our precious and limited supply of medical manpower; (4) a top-to-bottom overhauling of the United States Department of Agriculture and the transfer to it of control over the public domain; (5) completion of the streamlining of the Post Office Department and ripping out all vestiges of politics; (6) a complete review and reform of the abuses and malorganization which the Commission found in many Federal business enterprises.

Item 6 above offers a particularly fruitful field for congressional activity, as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation review of the Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency so clearly demonstrates.

Adoption of these remaining Commision recommendations will alleviate, to considerable extent, the increasing burden falling on the taxpayers. Your appreciation of this fact and your foresight in establishing the Commission is commendable.

You are at liberty to make such use of this letter as you choose.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE MANAGEMENT OF THE PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes to make a statement concerning the critical situation which has arisen over the management of th public debt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Virginia may proceed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, during my 6 years of service in the Virginia State Senate I was a member of the finance committee which handled both taxes and appropriations. Having through that service become familiar with the financing of the State government, I was happy to be privileged to serve for 10 years on the Ways and Means Committee of the National House of Representatives and to participate in the framing of 12 tax bills, including the financing of World War II. For the past 3 years I have served on the Senate Banking and Currency Committee as chairman of the Subcommittee on the Federal Reserve System with jurisdiction over the problems of banking and credit. My 24 years' study of fiscal matters have at least given me a keen appreciation of what is involved in our present unprecedented inflation, although I confess that a lifetime of study of either taxes or banking and currency would be insufficient to give any man expert knowledge of all the intricate details of either.

Knowing how deeply concerned I was over the present disagreement between the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board over the plan announced in New York on January 10 by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury for the management of the public debt, the chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], requested me last Monday to make an investigation of the matter and report to him whether or not I thought a public hearing on the issue involved by my subcommittee or by the full committee would serve a useful purpose.

On the following day, after conferring with officials of both agencies, I announced to the press that, while the problems confronting both the Treasury in the management of the public debt and of the Federal Reserve Board in the management of currency and credit as a brake upon inflation were bigger and more difficult than ever in our history, I felt that full and frank conferences between the officials of the two agencies, with the public welfare as the north star of any agreement being discussed, could result in an area of agreement and, if so, such a means of settlement was much to be preferred to a public hearing. I have never stated, as reported in at least one newspaper, that the issue is a dead one and that I had washed my hands of it.

On yesterday the Senator from South Carolina and I interviewed at length the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Open Market Committee of the Board and found them willing to enter into negotiations with the Secretary of the Treasury along the lines we suggested. The Senator from South Carolina and I urged immediate action since the issue was so vital to the Nation, and since all members of the Open Market Committee were in the city. The result of that conference was communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury, who this morning invited the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board to confer with him as a preliminary, I assume, to the type of conference suggested by the Senator from South Carolina and myself. Since the confidence of the public in the value of Government securities, without which there can be no successful management of the public debt, is involved, I hope that partisans of a high-interest rate and partisans of a low-interest rate, concerning which at the moment there is no categorical answer, will be restrained in their comments until we know whether or not a policy geared to the general welfare can be agreed upon by the two agencies in question.

During my service in the Congress I have found Mr. Richard L. Strout, of the Christian Science Monitor, to be one of the clearest and most accurate reporters on fiscal affairs. His article, published in the Christian Science Monitor of February 6, entitled "Reserve Board-Treasury Row Breaks Out Into Open," is a clear and accurate description of the issue involved, expressed in terms that a layman can understand, and I ask unanimous consent that the article be published in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVE BOARD-TREASURY ROW BREAKS OUT INTO OPEN

(By Richard L. Strout)

WASHINGTON.—A first-rate row has broken out between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board.

It involves the conflicting personalities of stubborn Missourian Harry S. Truman and crusty multimillionaire Marriner S. Eccles, Mormon banker.

It involves the pocketbook of nearly every American.

The majority faction on the Reserve Board charges, in effect, that the administration is doing a job of controlling inflation at the grocery store but at the same time is pumping out inflation for all it is worth at the corner bank.

To which quiet-voiced ex-small-town banker John Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, retorts in effect: "t aint so!"

Mr. Truman is listening to his old friend and close intimate, Mr. Snyder.

MAJORITY SEE SNYDER WRONG

As contrasted to Mr. Snyder, most Federal Reserve officials, the great majority of the bankers, and pretty nearly all economists say the Treasury Department and Mr. Truman are wrong.

This is no mere academic squabble.

It is true that it is extremely complicated. There is not a man in a thousand who can understand the ramifications of the credit-finance system and how bank loans and interest rates are turned into credit.

But there are two things to say: first, complex or not, the issue could hardly be more important because in the final analysis it involves the success or failure of Government efforts to lick inflation.

Second, although the windings of the banking credit system are intricate as a city's gas mains, the important thing to the average citizen is not the winding but whether when he strikes a match he gets gas.

In the same way it is the pragmatic effect of the complex system that is important rather than expert understanding of details.

Inflation is caused by a scarcity of goods in comparison to a plentiful supply of money and credit which bid up prices.

The Eccles school in the Reserve System charge that under presidential and Treasury Department pressure they are forced to support an "easy money" credit policy with low interest rates.

THE SNYDER ARGUMENT

Secretary Snyder likes low interest rates. The reason is natural. The United States is enormously in debt. If interest rates are low he does not have to pay so much on the debt. Interest payments are now $5,800,000,000 every year. Long term interest rates are about 2½ percent. Raise that interest rate as much as one-half of 1 percent, says Mr. Snyder, and presto, the Government's interest payment jumps $1,500,000,000.

This has to be added to the taxpayers' tax bill, Mr. Snyder points out.

On the face of it, it is an open and shut case. Low interest rates seem good for the taxpayer.

But now comes the other side of the argument.

Low interest rates for Government borrowing mean low interest rates for everybody else. Stripped of details the argument goes that low interest rates encourage speculation, business activity, inflation, just when the accent should be on belt-tightening and austerity.

Says the Eccles school the taxpayer stands to lose infinitely more by an easy-money policy that sees the basic value of the dollar depreciated by inflation, than by the hard-credit policy (higher interest rates) even though the latter boosts the cost of carrying the Federal debt.

PERSONAL FEUD INVOLVED

A bitter personal feud has got entangled in one of the great financial controversies of the day.

Until a few years ago Mr. Eccles was Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. His caustic independent comment and differences with Mr. Snyder got under President Truman's skin. When Mr. Eccles' term expired Mr. Truman politely reappointed him as a member of the Board but replaced him with good-natured friendly Thomas B. McCabe as the new Chairman. Mr. Eccles was demoted. Many thought the wealthy Mormon bachelor would resign from the Board. He stayed on, quietly seething. He is a tough fighter.

The interesting thing is that Philadelphia Banker McCabe seems to have come over to the Eccles viewpoint on the basic opposition to the Treasury's easy-money policy.

The big row burst into the open this week when the showdown came.

Mr. Truman called to the White House for a peace meeting the entire Board membership and heads of the five Federal Reserve big city banks.

Following the meeting, quick statements by Mr. Truman and the Treasury announced the Board had pledged itself to the Treasury program.

This looked like a complete capitulation.

Then came the bombshell.

TRUMAN VIEW CHALLENGED

On his own authority, and specifically stating that he was acting without consultation with other Board members, Mr. Eccles released the official minutes of the meeting prepared by Gov. R. M. Evans and approved by the Board.

These showed that the Truman-Snyder interpretation was incorrect or at any rate overstated the case. On the basic dispute the Reserve Board members had hardly expressed any opinion at all to Mr. Truman. The critical issue of interest rates had hardly been raised.

Internal evidence indicates that Mr. Truman took silence for consent at the meeting. His statement appears to have been issued in good faith. A bitter schism has appeared in the Reserve Board. Members ask why Chairman McCabe didn't act as their spokesman and present the issue. When Mr. Truman left the conference he apparently thought he had full agreement.

The seven board members and five bankers took a vote afterward on a motion to suspend independent action and go along with Mr. Snyder and the Treasury on interest rates. It was defeated 8 to 4. Here was the vote.

For the motion: Board Governors Vardaman, Powell, Norton & Evans. Against: Board Chairman McCabe, governors Eccles, Szymczak, bankers Sproul, Young, Peyton, Gilbert & Erickson.

In such bitter division the crucial inflation issue now stands.

THE MEAT SITUATION—STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUTLER OF NEBRASKA

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, it has been my intention to obtain the floor today, if possible, to make a statement in regard to the meat situation. However, in view of the fact that I understand that the program for today is to be a very busy one, and in view of the fact that I have to attend a committee meeting at 2 o'clock, I ask unanimous consent to have the statement which I intended to make printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. BUTLER's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DON'T HAMPER THE MEAT PRODUCER

(Statement by Senator H. BUTLER)

During the last few weeks, the livestock producer and the meat industry generally seem to have been selected and singled out as the principal object of the efforts of the Office of Price Stabilization in its program of controlling the cost of living. Almost every edition of any daily newspaper carries stories about new orders or rumors of orders to control the production of meat. Meat prices were, supposedly at least, frozen along with the general freeze of all prices issued a few days ago. In addition, we are told that slaughterers are to be placed under a special licensing system, and are to be required to make special reports. There is talk of meat rationing, and there are rumors of subsidies as an instrument of price control. In fact, there are rumors of almost every conceivable price-control technique on meat and livestock.

Evidently, there is a sort of crusade underway against the farmer and the livestock producer. Apparently, he is to be the object of all the experiments that may come to the minds of those administering price control. Furthermore, it is apparent that he has been selected as the goat of the whole inflation problem. The story has been presented to the public that meat prices must be controlled first and most thoroughly, if other items in the cost of living are to be controlled.

This general campaign against the farmer has gone to such lengths that I believe it is time for some of us from farming areas to speak out. If there has been any inflation to date, the farmer is not the cause of it. Industrial prices and wages have reached new record heights. Farm prices have not yet even recovered from the price collapse of the last few years. Farm prices are still well below the level of 3 years ago. In fact, prices of many farm products are still well below parity.

I realize, of course, that there are those in the administration who would like to place ceilings on farm products at levels below parity. Parity prices for farmers are a favorite target for some big-city newspapers. During the last few months, the volume of criticism of some of the daily newspapers has increased steadily in volume against Congress—for refusing to permit ceilings below parity.

It is certainly true that Congress insisted that no ceilings be placed on farm products below parity. Congress put that provision in the law, and I hope and believe that Congress will keep it in. I, for one, would never vote to take it out. If we are to have a system of price controls, the farmer is certainly entitled to a fair price under such controls—and that's what parity is.

Returning now to these various proposals to control livestock and meat, just why are any controls necessary on livestock or livestock products?

I can understand the absolute necessity for placing price controls on those products of which there is an actual physical shortage because they are being used directly for rearmament. The shortage of these items would create such a scramble among consumers that their prices would certainly go sky high if there were no controls. There is no shortage of meat, however, and the men of the armed services do not eat any more meat than they did at home, or at least not enough to make any difference.

I can also understand why it may be necessary to control the prices of many manufactured items during an extreme sellers' market, such as we have now. Industrial prices are generally set by the industrial firms selling the goods. The purchaser has no choice except to pay whatever price is asked or do without. That is not the situation that the farmer faces in the sale of his products. He has no way of setting his own price on the products he sells. The price for his produce is set by the buyer, or at an auction, or perhaps by the fluctations of an open market. It is, so to speak, always a buyers' market for farm products.

There is no way that the farmer can exploit his customers, even if he wanted to. He has virtually no control over the price of what he sells.

In short, we are now speaking of putting a ceiling on an item which is in plentiful supply and which is sold in an open, uncontrolled market where buyers freely purchase whatever quantities they want at prices they agree upon. If prices have gone up, it is because buyers have bid them up.

I suggest that if meat and cattle prices have gone up too much, it is not the fault of the livestock producer. It is because of inflationary governmental policies, and particularly because of wrong Federal financial policies. Prices are being pushed up because the Federal Government is spending more than it takes in, and that is the only reason. We can correct it and prevent it if we choose by balancing the budget.

Mr. President, I do not believe that it is in the interests of either producer or consumer to attempt to control the price of either meat or cattle at this time, and under present conditions. I believe that the attempt at control will defeat its own purpose. Furthermore, I believe our experience should teach us that it is virtually impossible to exercise effective control over meat.

As I mentioned before, there is no shortage of meat in this country—yet. There may be if the livestock industry must submit to price controls, but today our supplies of meat are practically at an all-time high. That supply can be increased still further if the meat industry is not hampered and discouraged by unrealistic control. Let me cite a few of the basic facts about the meat supply.

Last year, after making allowances for the quantity of meat required by the armed services, there was still available 145 pounds of meat per capita for our entire population. That is not quite a record supply per capita, but it is very close to it. This year, there will be even more—146 pounds per capita.

That is more meat per person than was consumed in any year since 1947. It is substantially more than in any prewar year. This supply of meat can be even further increased by a considerable amount. Production of meat has been rising for the last 3 years. During that same period, feed supplies have been increasing ever faster. Production of feed over the past 3 years (including an allowance for normal quantities of wheat and rye for feed) has averaged nearly 155,000,000 tons. That is more feed than we have ever used in any year—even in our peak production year of 1944.

We are starting into this defense production effort with an all-time record carryover of feeds. The corn carry-over this year is 860,000,000 bushels (25 percent of the normal crop). In addition, we are fortunate in that we are now on a rising trend of cattle numbers. During and following the OPA days, there was extensive slaughter of herds. Cattle numbers on farms dropped from a peak of 85,573,000 head down to a low point of 78,126,000. During the past few years, that figure has climbed up rapidly again. On the first of January 1950, there were 80,277,000 head, and it is expected that the figure for January 1, 1951, will be at least 82,000,000. If there is no interference with this process, we may hope that cattle numbers will continue to rise rapidly, at least to 85,000,000, and perhaps even to 90,000,000 head. That will mean more breeding stock, and also more meat on the hoof within a comparatively short time. As I have already pointed out, we will undoubtedly have the feed to carry this increased number of cattle, and produce the additional meat we want.

Under these circumstances, it is highly probable that meat production can be pushed well past the production level of 1944, which allowed 153 pounds of meat per person, aside from those in the armed services. I can understand that consumers would like to have their meat at a low price, but I believe they also want to secure the maximum quantity of meat. Unwise controls will cut down this production and cut into the meat supply that consumers want.

There is another problem which is peculiar to the meat industry. That is the virtual impossibility of really effective controls. Meat is produced on thousands of farms all over this country. Much of it is processed in a few packing plants, but it does not have to be. It does not take very elaborate equipment to slaughter livestock and prepare the meat for consumption. Furthermore, livestock can be and is sold not only at the large stockyards, but also at country markets, by private sales, and virtually at every crossroads. The marketing channels are extremely fluid and can be readily changed.

There are no precise grades or quality classifications that can be placed on live cattle. Each shipment of beef cattle commands its own price on its own merits. Therefore, it is not possible to establish effective ceilings by grade.

Altogether the livestock industry is the one industry that is just impossible to control effectively. There are too many different possible markets, too many individual differences in cattle, too many ways to get around the control machinery.

We have learned from our experience during World War II that a simple price ceiling is not enough to do the job. Price ceilings create shortages and the apparent need for rationing. If any real attempt is made to enforce price ceilings, I predict that we will have meat rationing within 3 months. If we do, that is when the black marketeers will really come into their own. I have heard rumors that there are packing houses now closed down, which are getting ready to reopen as soon as rationing is restored and black market opportunities arise. During World War II, the black marketeers were amateurs at the game, but now they have learned all the tricks. I am afraid they will do a professional job of diverting the meat from the legitimate channels and into the black market.

Altogether the job of administering such a complex system of controls would tax the ingenuity of the most competent, honest, and nonpartisan administrative organization. Unfortunately, it does not seem likely that we shall have such an organization to administer this system. The administration has already given clear evidence that price-control machinery is to be handled on a strictly political basis. The Office of Price Stabilization is being loaded up with political appointees and "lame ducks" of every description. In State after State, the better positions are being parceled out to those acceptable to the Democratic organization. Thus these high-salaried positions are being reserved to a select clique, but more important, those holding the top enforcement jobs will be in position to use their authority for the benefit of the party. It is safe to assume that if any black marketeers who are not on friendly terms with this administration are caught, they will be prosecuted. Whether party stalwarts who break the regulations will receive the same treatment, remains to be seen.

Mr. President, altogether the difficulties in a program of this sort are tremendous, while the advantages are questionable. To my mind, the whole attempt is virtually a confession that we have failed to develop sound policies to finance this rearmament effort. Why should price controls and rationing be necessary if there is no shortage? Why, at the very time when we want and need more meat, should we take an action which will necessarily hinder the production of meat? The livestock men of this country can produce all the meat we can possibly require, and at a fair price. If given a chance, they will do so in response to the normal play of the forces of supply and demand. They can and will expand livestock numbers and increase meat production very sharply within a year or two, now that they know there is a market for it. We are foolish if we do not let them do so.

Instead, the Office of Price Stabilization appears intent on holding down meat production, thereby creating an artificial shortage, and then rationing the shortage.

In this emergency, Mr. President, I suggest that much of our thinking is in the wrong direction. Instead of restriction, we need expansion. Instead of cutting down on necessities, we need more production to produce those necessities and to meet the demands of rearmament.

To take the other course is to take the path that Socialist England has taken. England put price controls and rationing on early in World War II and has never reached the point where she can take them off. The price of meat is controlled, but there is no meat. The individual ration for meat has been cut—again and again. It is now less than one-half what was allowed during World War II. Today in England, the individual ration for meat is so small that it provides each consumer about one square meal per week. That is the course, I am afraid, down which we are being led. I do not worry so much about temporary hardships and temporary controls. I am more afraid that these temporary emergencies will be used to fasten a control system on us permanently. That is my real fear, and that is why I am protesting today.

Mr. President, price ceilings and rationing will never solve the problem of supplying meat to our people, but production will. I urge most strongly that the Office of Price Stabilization, in its consideration of any proposed regulations and controls, will adhere to that fundamental principle.

PRICES RECEIVED BY FARMERS FOR EGGS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD a list which appeared in the Renville County Farmer, a very fine newspaper published in Renville County, N. Dak., showing that the price of eggs on February 1 to the farmer was 25 cents a dozen.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPLAINT BY DEFIANCE SPARK PLUG CORP. CHARGING MONOPOLY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to address the Senate for 2 minutes in connection with a letter which I wish to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from North Dakota may proceed.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the letter is dated January 25, 1951. It relates to Federal Trade Commission Docket No. 3977.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the Democratic leader, to this letter. I do not know the writer of the letter, although I have had some correspondence with him since I received the letter, but what he states in his letter is in direct contrast to everything the Democratic Party promised the people at the last election.

I now read the letter:

DEAR SENATOR LANGER: May 4, 1937, we filed complaint with the Federal Trade Commission against Champion Spark Plug Co. charging monopoly.

Final hearing was held December 4, 1950, in Washington.

Thirteen years is a long waiting period. The Big Three—Champion Spark Plug Co., AC Spark Plug Co., and Electric Auto-Lite Co.—have 90 percent of the spark-plug business in the country, while some 40 small manufacturers are bleeding to death; more than 20 have "passed on."

Can anything be done to hasten action by the Commission?

Thank you.

Very truly yours,

DEFIANCE SPARK PLUG CORP.,
RAYMOND P. LIPE, President.

I may say that three of the present members of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Mead, Mr. Carson, and Mr. Spingarn, are not to blame for the condition complained of in the letter; but if any member of the Commission has served on it for as long as 10 years, I suggest that he should resign his office and should let a competent person take his place.

Mr. President, in that connection I hold in my hand a list of the licensed attorneys in North Dakota. This list gives the name of every licensed lawyer in that State. I ask unanimous consent that the list be printed along with the letter. I suggest that any lawyer practicing in North Dakota, no matter how young or how old he may be, can do a better job than has been done in this case, in which 13 years have passed without the taking of action.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX LAWS MUST BE BASED ON EQUALITY OF SACRIFICE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed approximately 4 minutes in which to make a statement on the President's tax message.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Minnesota may proceed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the American people last week read with great interest the tax message submitted by the President. I heartily endorse the President's determination to pay as we go for our expanding defense effort. It is wise to tailor the tax program to the unfolding defense program, pushing through about $10,000,000,000 of higher taxes now, and holding the rest of the tax increase until the military picture unfolds.

A pay-as-we-go tax policy is the least we can do in the face of the sacrifices being made by the men and women in our Armed Forces. Besides, it is just common sense to match expenditures on guns, planes, ships, and tanks with tax receipts. Otherwise, the Government will incur large deficits, and the inevitable result will be more inflation.

I am sure that the American people see the need for additional taxes. I am also sure that they are willing to make their contribution, even if it hurts. But we cannot in good faith ask the rank and file to pay their share when a chosen few can take advantage of glaring loopholes in the tax laws. It would violate every test of equal sacrifice to ask the man in the street to pay higher excise and income taxes when the rich become richer through our failure to close loopholes.

I, for one, will insist that the $10,000,000,000 tax bill be accompanied by a firm commitment that loopholes will be closed. The American people demanded an excess-profits tax last year, long before the Congress acted. This year the American people will insist on a tough loophole-closing program to catch the tax dodgers. They want to have a right to equality of sacrifices; they oppose special tax privileges for anybody. I intend to make it my business, and I hope that other Senators and Representatives will join me in the effort to tell the people the unvarnished truth about these loopholes.

Those who want to keep on protecting the privileged few will argue that loophole closing will not raise much revenue. It is a familiar line: "Why worry about the few dollars that slip through the net? The real money lies in raising rates." This is false counsel. Let there be no mistake about the fact that billions of dollars can be raised by plugging loopholes. Here are a few samples:

First. The excess-profits tax which was enacted by the last Congress is full of holes. Railroads, utilities, natural-gas companies, and other regulated companies are virtually exempt from tax. Congress has also guaranteed other corporations fabulous levels of profits free of excess-profits tax by a number of technical provisions, such as the growth formula and the special allowances for borrowed capital. By tightening up the excess-profits tax we could raise at least $1,000,000,000.

Second. Our unbelievably generous depletion provisions hand the oil and mining interests half a billion dollars each year. Last year, the President called this loophole the most glaring in the tax laws. Congress did nothing about it. This year, with tax rates going still higher, this loophole is even more unconscionable and more expensive.

Third. The estate and gift taxes are in a pitiable state. It is unbelievable that, in a country so wealthy as ours, these taxes raise little more than three-quarters of a billion dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury presented a plan to the Congress last year for tightening up these taxes. Again nothing was done. Yet there are at least another three-quarters of a billion dollars to be had for the asking from the estate and gift taxes, by plugging loopholes, raising rates, and reducing the big exemptions. Let us make these taxes do the job they ought to in the richest country in the world.

Fourth. At the same time that wage earners are paying every last cent of their taxes because the money is withheld from their pay envelopes, billions of dollars of interest and dividends are evading taxes. This criminal evasion must be stopped. One of the best ways to do this is to withhold the tax from interest and dividends, just as we do on wages and salaries. By this elementary improvement in enforcement, we can add at least $300,000,000 a year to our revenues.

Fifth. The income-splitting provisions enacted by the Eightieth Congress confer unwarranted tax benefits on the well-to-do. People in the lowest tax bracket gained nothing from this provision. At the $25,000 level, it reduced the taxes of a married person by more than a quarter. We cannot afford to give such hand-outs in times like these. If the benefits of income splitting were eliminated, we could increase tax collections by no less than $2,500,000,000.

These five items alone add up to an even $5,000,000,000. I have not mentioned others, such as the loopholes in the capital-gains provisions, the tax exemption for interest on State and local bonds, and the weak tax provisions for life-insurance companies. I have no doubt that a determined effort to close all the loopholes could be made to yield practically all of the $6,500,000,000 needed over and above the $10,000,000,000 program itemized by the President.

Last year, when the Senate was considering the Revenue Act of 1950, I joined with my able colleagues, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] in bringing to the attention of the Senate defects in the bill. We presented at that time 12 amendments designed to close various loopholes in tax legislation. I am pleased to say that we will again, with the assistance of other distinguished and able Members of this body, make an effort to improve the tax laws by eliminating loopholes. It is our hope that, with the assistance of the American people, this will be done. Already, as a result of the energetic activities of radio commentators such as Mr. Frank Edwards and Mr. Drew Pearson, many thousands of Americans have written to me expressing interest in our activities, and requesting information.

I therefore ask unanimous consent at this point that there be included, following my remarks, a summary of our tax presentation on the floor of the Senate of last year outlining certain of the tax loopholes which were at issue in the 81st Congress.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY BY SENATOR HUMPHREY OF TAX BILL AMENDMENTS TO CLOSE LOOPHOLES

It is essential for the American people and all their representatives in Congress to know more about Federal taxation. It is not enough merely to know that a graduated individual income tax is desirable, because it is based on ability to pay, and that a sales tax is bad because it hits hardest those with lowest incomes and largest families. In order to insure that everyone pays his fair share of income taxes we have several considerations that must be taken into account:

1. We have to weed out those who misrepresent the amount of their income when they fill out their tax return. This is primarily the job of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, but the rest of us can help out by frowning upon sharp tax practices and assuming our responsibilities as citizens.

2. We have to keep a sharp lookout that our graduated income tax system is not defeated by efforts of individuals or corporations to divide or "split" income with other persons in such a way as to avoid payment of taxes, while at the same time retaining effective economic control of the income.

3. Another source of trouble has been the availability of a much lower rate of tax on so-called "long-term" capital gains, with the resultant temptation to taxpayers to try to claim that ordinary, recurrent income is really a capital gain.

4. There is constant pressure upon taxpayers (and those who do not want to pay taxes) to reduce their taxable income by charging off greater deductions than would normally be allowable under proper rules of accounting.

Finally, there are the pleas, usually upon some claim of injustice, discrimination or unconstitutionality, that all or part of the income of an individual or corporation should not be subject to any tax at all.

This summation of the principal current problems of Federal income taxation may wreak havoc with the erudite concepts of the tax lawyers, accountants and economists. But I have taken this approach in an earnest effort to understand how the income tax part of the Federal tax system really operates. Perhaps a little unorthodoxy can help us dispel some of the fog which enshrouds the twists and turns of Federal taxation as tightly as do all the security regulations in the field of atomic energy.

If we analyze the provisions of the pending bill, and the decisions of the Committee on Finance, there are a number which seem to fall within the broad confines of the five areas I have outlined.

An analysis of the 12 amendments introduced by me is as follows:

1. Dividend withholding: Out of about eight million paid out in corporation dividends annually, one billion is not reported on stockholder tax returns. Wage earners must pay taxes as earned, why continue to tolerate evasion by coupon clippers? The provision in the House bill for withholding taxes on dividends should be restored. The Government is now losing between one hundred and sixty and one hundred and seventy million dollars a year under present law.

2. Percentage depletion: Neither the Senate nor House bill does anything to limit the excessive depletion allowances for oil and gas and other minerals which the President described as the worst loophole in our tax laws. This windfall costs the Government $400,000,000 a year. If an ordinary businessman invests $100,000 in plant and equipment, he gets a tax deduction of this amount prorated over the useful life of the property. Another man who invests in an oil well can, through "percentage depletion" allowances obtain a tax deduction not only for the $100,000 initial investment, but several times this amount.

3. Oil royalties: Instead of receiving royalties from oil wells, which are subject to ordinary income and surtax rates, oilmen would be able to "sell" their right to such income for a 1-year period or longer, and be subject only to capital-gain rates. Many oilmen are now taxed at normal and surtax rates totaling 50 percent or more. Yet these operators would pay, under the committee bill, at only the capital-gain rate of 25 percent on such "in-oil" payments.

4. Family partnerships: This is a retroactive reversal of Supreme Court decisions which refused to allow businessmen to make fictitious "partners" of their wives, children, and other relatives, solely to split up their income for tax purposes. For example, the tax on an unmarried man with an income of $40,000 a year amounts to almost $17,000, or nearly double the total taxes of $8,500 payable on four incomes of $10,000 each.

5. Stock options: Corporate executives would be allowed to pay at capital-gains rates in lieu of normal and surtax rates, on that part of their salary received in the form of options to buy company stock at less than market price. An unmarried executive earning $30,000 a year would pay $12,000 more in taxes if given a $20,000 a year cash bonus. If the bonus is paid in stock options, under the Finance Committee bill he would pay only $5,000 more in taxes.

6. Tax-free redemption of stocks to pay estate taxes: Estates of owners of corporations would be allowed to draw down accumulated earnings and profits free of income tax to the extent used to pay estate and inheritance taxes. This amendment has practical application under present gift and estate tax exemptions only to single persons with estates of $250,000 and over, or to married persons with estates of $500,000 or more.

7. Corporate spin-offs: This provision would exempt from taxation the value of new stocks distributed to stockholders by a corporation which decided to "spin off" part of its business into a separate firm. These stocks are now considered as "dividends" for tax purposes and, thus, are subject to individual income taxes. Under the committee bill, therefore, accumulated corporate profits could be distributed to stockholders at capital gains tax rates instead of the usual normal and surtax rates applicable to dividends. This amendment is of real benefit only to single persons with income of $18,000 a year and married couples of $33,000 a year.

8. Amortization of emergency facilities: While omitting an excess-profits tax on corporations, the committee bill would permit accelerated amortization of plants and equipment certified to be necessary for the current emergency. Instead of the usual 15- to 40-year period of depreciation for tax purposes, the entire cost could be recovered tax-free within a period of 5 years. The report of the Senate Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program states that many persons responsible for the renegotiation of war contracts in World War II considered accelerated depreciation as the greatest source of excessive profits during the last war.

9. Section 117 (j): Since 1942 the tax law has contained a "heads I win, tails you lose" provision in favor of a taxpayer who sells property used in his trade or business. If the sale results in a profit, it is taxed as a capital gain. If it results in a loss, the loss is treated as a fully deductible ordinary loss. The Treasury has estimated this loophole as costing about $70,000,000. Accelerated amortization greatly expands the importance of this loophole.

10. Life-insurance companies: At a time when other individual and corporate taxpayers are overburdened, life-insurance companies paid no taxes on income for 1947, 1948, and 1949. This results from a technical error in the Revenue Act of 1942. The committee bill would in effect grant a $50,000,000 tax melon to the life-insurance industry by striking out the provisions in the House bill for collection of the 1947 and 1948 tax liabilities.

11. Foreign subsidiaries of domestic corporations: The House bill would have closed a loophole in the existing law under which domestic corporations can liquidate subsidiaries operating abroad (such as oil companies), and bring back tax-free profits that have never passed through the Federal income tax stream. The committee bill would retain this glaring loophole.

12. Reduction in holding period for long-term capital gains: Under existing law a capital gain is taxable at a maximum rate of 25 percent if the asset was held for over 6 months. Under the Senate bill this period is reduced to 3 months. This amendment, which was included in the House bill and approved by the Finance Committee, fits best the tax needs of the stock market and commodity speculators, who are thus permitted to convert ordinary profits into capital gains. This loophole will benefit principally single persons above $18,000 and married couples above $36,000.

DEEDS PROVE THEIR VALOR—EDITORIAL FROM THE INDIANAPOLIS STAR

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Deeds Prove Their Valor," published in the Indianapolis Star of February 2, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEEDS PROVE THEIR VALOR

When Drew Pearson gave credence to an alleged Red Chinese "combat bulletin" in yesterday's column, in which the American Army in Korea was pictured as a gang of cowards, we expected a storm of protest, which the Star has received, and in which we wish to join.

According to the bulletin from which the Washington columnist quoted American troops are not aggressive, tend to panic and "quail and flinch at the sound of heavy firing." Mr. Pearson then added on his own part that this "Chinese intelligence estimate" was true, although we are not aware that he has visited the Korean front or that he has access to official military information which is not available to other reporters.

The record of America's fighting forces in Korea speaks for itself. Against tremendous odds our troops have held on in that miserable land and have inflicted terrible punishment on the enemy.

Dispatches of front-line reporters in Korea have drawn a far more reliable picture of the performance of American troops than any "intelligence estimate" which the enemy is likely to distribute or any of Drew Pearson's "pipeline" information. These dispatches, uncensored until recently, have consistently disclosed a high quality of aggressiveness and a wealth of individual and unit gallantry on the part of United States forces of which every American can be fiercely proud.

The very best we can say for Mr. Pearson in this instance is that he is innocently or overzealously promoting a dangerous generality which gives aid and comfort to the enemy. Throughout history a favorite propaganda trick has been to impugn the foe's courage. Hitler called Americans decadent cowards and, to his misfortune, came to believe his own lie. Stalin and his Chinese stooges know better but they are busily advancing the same lie. But the deeds of our men in Korea shout down both this lie and the unfortunate opinion which Mr. Pearson chose to express.

FARM POLICY COUNCIL

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the Senate for less than 2 minutes regarding the Farm Policy Council.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, as a result of the hearings conducted by the Select Committee on Small Business of the Senate, it becomes quite apparent that drastic shortages of material and manpower are appearing. Thousands upon thousands of small businesses are confronted with the possibility of having to give up unless raw materials and supplies upon which they must depend for their very existence are available even in restricted quantities.

No one objects to the shortages of such materials as steel, lead, zinc, nickel, aluminum, electrical supplies which are actually needed in furtherance of the war effort. Thousands of small businesses are interested in the manufacturing, processing, and distribution of much-needed farm supplies and those used in connection with specialized farming activities in dairying, poultry raising, and many other types of small industries in supplying farm trade. The farm groups who are interested in seeing that they receive just consideration for supplies have done a very good job in organizing to make their demands and requests known and to see that businesses directly connected with farm-producing activities are not overlooked.

There appears in the February 1951 issue of the Country Gentleman an editorial entitled "Let's Strengthen Agriculture's Position." This editorial stresses the need of the farming interests for better safeguards as to their position both in the producing program and the farm-labor situation, which, from reports, can become critical before next summer. This editorial further points out that this is not a matter that affects the farming interests alone. Everyone has a stake in what is likely to happen. Everyone wants plenty of food. The defense program needs the necessary supplies. This editorial stresses the need and the necessity for a Farm Policy Council to be set up by the leading farm organizations with the responsibility of watching over the needs of farming, including farm labor, and to present these matters before the proper groups charged with the administration of the various defense production boards and groups.

Mr. President, I think this editorial is so timely and is so important to the agricultural interests of this Nation that I ask unanimous consent that it be incorporated in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S STRENGTHEN AGRICULTURE'S POSITION

Farming needs to be better safeguarded under the defense production program. The farm labor situation, which could become critical by next summer, is an example of what can happen unless the interests of agriculture are properly looked after.

It isn't a matter that affects farmers alone. The public, which will have to do without some other things, will want plenty of food and the defense program requires ample supplies of food and fiber. But neither fact assures prompt attention to farm needs for all-out production. Somebody will have to take the responsibility for getting that kind of attention.

The Defense Production Act, passed by Congress, did fairly well in protecting farm prices. But it left the Department of Agriculture with little authority over the workings of the defense program. The Department can advise and can present claims for materials necessary for farm production. But this does not mean they will be granted. It will be only one of a number of interests pressing claims for materials, some of them with a stronger backing than agriculture now has in Washington.

Not only vigor in pressing farm requirements but an alertness in anticipating them is needed. The farm labor situation, reported in the Roundup columns on pages 4 and 10 of this issue, shows how important this can be. Such a loss of experienced farm workers, as now seems certain, may seriously handicap the heavy production program that has been called for. Farming is in a much different position than at the outbreak of World War II. At that time a surplus of farm workers had been backed up on the farms by the depression. Even then a farm manpower shortage soon developed. There is scant surplus of farm manpower now and farming is mechanized to twice the extent it was in 1941. Just any kind of worker won't do now.

This makes it imperative also that a shortage of spare parts be averted in the future. Many farmers keenly recall the time they spent and the distances they traveled trying to find needed parts during the last war. A far more highly mechanized agriculture couldn't stand that sort of experience again. Somebody will have to see to it that it doesn't happen.

Agriculture isn't in a position to do much about such things now. Outside the Department's services it has been represented only by a consulting committee on the National Resources Security Board, now superseded by the Office of Defense Mobilization. This committee was not fully representative of farming and has been of little effect.

Something is needed to strengthen the position of agriculture. For that purpose Country Gentleman suggests a farm policy council, set up by the leading farm organizations. Its job would be to keep watch over the needs of farming and to press them vigorously when they arise. Labor has such a council and there has been no lack of vigor in presenting labor's case in Washington. A council, fully representative of agriculture, could be an effective voice in its behalf. It could cooperate with the Secretary if he were willing, as he should be, and reinforce his claims for needed farm help and materials. And it could work along the same lines with the two agricultural committees of Congress.

But, before any such council can be set up, two things will be necessary. The various farm organizations will have to submerge their differences and work together for the common good of the farmers they represent. And there will have to be less thinking in terms of commodity groups and more in terms of agriculture as a whole.

This lack of unity and the struggle for special commodity gains together make up one of the reasons why agriculture isn't in as strong a position as it should be. The effects are felt both in Washington and in the attitude of the public, which isn't any too friendly toward farming and is inclined to take its food supply for granted.

These disadvantages should be removed. In this emergency farming requires a single effective medium through which its needs can get attention. It ought to have a responsible channel through which it can reach the public with the facts about agriculture. A farm policy council could render both these services. The farm organizations should see the opportunity and act upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further routine matters, the Senator from Ohio is recognized.

THE EUROPEAN ARMY PROJECT

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the most serious and fundamental question before Congress today is whether we shall establish, and furnish troops for, an integrated European army under centralized command. Even today people hardly realize the tremendous implications of this proposal. On the decision we make may hang the issue of peace or war. On that decision depends the size of the Armed Forces, perhaps for the next 10 years. On the size of those forces hangs the tax burden which must be paid by the American people during that period. It will determine also the question whether we must draft boys of 18 or 18½ or 19 with all of its effect on education and industry. Finally, the extent of credit and price and wage controls so difficult to enforce and so burdensome on freedom and progress, will also be measured by the size of our Armed Forces and the economic effort in arming other countries.

General Eisenhower has made a report to us regarding the interest of the European nations in protecting themselves against Russian aggression. He has done a fine job of raising their morale and tells us of his hope that they will do their share. He has expressed his general approval of the project before us. But in my mind, at least, his report only makes this whole plan more hazy and indefinite and uncertain in outline than it was before his return.

At this time, therefore, I wish to discuss certain questions relating to this project:

First. What is the project, and to what share in it do we obligate ourselves?

Second. Is the President to have unlimited power to act without approval of Congress, or are the people themselves to have a voice in deciding the extent and nature of this revolutionary program?

Third. To what extent do we all agree on certain fundamental principles relating to the resistance to Communist aggression in the world, and in particular in Europe?

Fourth. Is the program a wise program and, if so, should its limitations be clearly stated?

1. WHAT IS THE PROJECT, AND TO WHAT SHARE IN IT DO WE OBLIGATE OURSELVES?

Before General Eisenhower's return, I had supposed there was a definite plan agreed upon at Brussels. Article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty reads as follows:

> The parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this treaty. * * * The council * * * shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5.

The report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee says that the powers of the council "are purely advisory with respect to governmental action. Its purpose is to make recommendations to the governments and to assist them in reaching coordinated decisions. It should be emphasized, however, that the responsibility for making decisions lies in the respective governments rather than in the councils. * * * The defense committee will concern itself primarily with making plans and recommendations for the implementation of articles 3 and 5, i. e., preparation for the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense. Being subordinate to the council, it too shall have only advisory powers."

In December 1950, the council established under article 9 met in Brussels and issued the following communiqué on December 19th:

> The North Atlantic Council, acting on the recommendations of its defense committee, today completed arrangements initiated in September last for the establishment in Europe of an integrated force under a centralized control and command. This force is to be composed of contingents contributed by the participating governments.

The North Atlantic Council speaks as if it had authority to do so, although its recommendations are simply advisory, under the treaty.

On December 22 Secretary Acheson made the following statement about the Brussels agreement:

> At Brussels we did several things. We took recommendations which had come from the meetings immediately preceding in London and acted on those recommendations. They had to do with the creation of the united, unified, integrated army which is to provide for the defense of Europe.
> The papers which came to us laid out the structure of that army, how it should be composed, of what troops, where should the troops come from, how should it be organized, what was its command structure which would give that army its direction, and how should the supreme commander be selected and appointed. All of these matters were dealt with in the papers that came to us and all of those matters were acted upon. The structure was agreed upon and the force was created.

Mr. President, I cannot understand what authority Secretary Acheson had in that connection, because I do not think there was anything but advisory power in the Council; but that is the statement which he issued.

Today no one knows whether an agreement was entered into or not. General Eisenhower tells the committees that he does not know whether or not there is any commitment on our part. Congress is unable to obtain any reliable information as to the size of the "united, unified, integrated army which is to provide for the defense of Europe." We are unable to find out how many American divisions are to be contributed to it. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] seems to feel that the army is to be one of 55 divisions of which we should contribute 10. I have heard from high sources that it is to be approximately 60 divisions of which we ultimately will contribute 15. The newspapers report some talk in the committees of a total army of 40 divisions by the end of 1952 after 2 years of preparation. There has also been some suggestion that there will be five or six American divisions in Europe by the end of 1951. General Eisenhower has said that we would only contribute a minor fraction, but not a major fraction, but this might mean 30 percent or 40 percent and might amount to a million men before our obligations are finally completed.

The number of foreign divisions at that time or any time is clouded in doubt. General Eisenhower stated that there would be 25 French divisions at the end of 1952, but this was immediately contradicted by Mr. Pleven, and the figure perhaps is 15 divisions on that date, and 20 divisions by the end of 1953. I get the general impression from General Eisenhower's broadcast and testimony that we will contribute five or six divisions in 1951, including the two already in Germany, and then wait to see what the others do. At Brussels it seems to have been contemplated that there would be German divisions, but General Eisenhower says that the Germans are out for the present.

Mr. President, there is just as much uncertainty regarding the nature of the proposed army as there is concerning the status of General Eisenhower himself. He did not tell the committee whether he was only the President's representative in Europe, or whether he was a commander of the new army deriving his power from the action of nine governments. It seems clear to me from the communiqué issued in Brussels that he is the appointee of the Atlantic Pact nations if they had any authority to set up an army, which I doubt. Perhaps the Council's action is only a recommendation. Is this in fact an international army, or is it only a loose grouping of various national armies? To whom are the American divisions responsible after they are asisgned to this army? Do they take orders only from General Eisenhower, or do they take orders from General Marshall or General Collins? Can General Eisenhower overrule the Joint Chiefs of Staff on questions of military strategy, or are they to be superior to him?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I shall be glad to yield for a question. I do not wish to break up my remarks unduly.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Before the Senator leaves the question of the number of divisions, let me inquire if he heard the testimony of General Eisenhower, or read his testimony, before the Armed Services Committee in which he said, in answer to a question by the Senator from Nebraska, that he believed the Europeans would furnish the bulk of the land forces in Europe.

Mr. TAFT. The only quotation I saw, and that was in the newspapers, was that the United States would provide a minor fraction and not a major fraction. Perhaps he used those words before the House committee. But he says "the bulk," whatever that may mean. Possibly it means 60 or 70 or 75 percent. I do not know what "bulk" means. But there is no question that General Eisenhower stated that we are at least not to put up a majority, but how much less than a majority I think remains in doubt.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I think it is a very substantial part of the Army.

Mr. TAFT. However, the Senator is not able to tell me what branches are involved.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. No; that was not specifically stated.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, in all my experience in Washington I have never seen an important program so confused and uncertain. Yet we are to be asked to pass upon it within the next few weeks.

In that connection, Mr. President, I should like to read a quotation from The Economist of January 13, 1951, as follows:

> The machinery of the Atlantic Pact, now nearly 2 years old, remains for the layman as mysterious, incoherent, and confusing as ever. "There was a time when no one outside the organization could understand what went on inside," so a distinguished adviser at the Brussels meeting of the Atlantic Council was heard to mutter. "But," he continued sadly, "now no one inside can understand either."

Mr. President, this is secret diplomacy with a vengeance. It seems to me that there was a definite plan, but that the administration is deliberately concealing its nature, or delaying its completion, because it is afraid Congress will not consider the detailed proposal as practical, fair, or desirable.

So far as I can see at the moment, Congress is going to be asked to set up a great Armed Force of 3,500,000 American boys and give the President carte blanche to do anything with them which he wishes to do. If he claims that he had the power to send troops to Korea, he must be claiming the right without approval of Congress to send them to any other country in the world if that country is attacked by another country. He apparently claims authority to assign them to any foreign commander, or to any international force which he approves. This is a straight demand for simple dictatorship and a claim of power which no President has ever had in time of peace.

Let the administration submit this project in definite form. We cannot intelligently pass on it otherwise. Without this we cannot intelligently pass on the size of our Armed Forces, our draft laws, or our tax laws. I can hear cries now that a definite plan would reveal top secrets to the enemy. I can only say that within 1 week from the time the size of the Army, and the proportion and size of the American contribution is fixed, every columnist in the United States will know what it is and discuss it in his columns.

2. IS THE PRESIDENT TO HAVE UNLIMITED POWER TO ACT WITHOUT APPROVAL OF CONGRESS, OR ARE THE PEOPLE THEMSELVES TO HAVE A VOICE IN DECIDING THE EXTENT AND NATURE OF THIS REVOLUTIONARY PROGRAM?

I do not think that the American people have ever faced a more serious constitutional issue, or one which in the end may present a greater threat to its freedom. The framers of the Constitution provided expressly that only Congress can do certain things, and we find these powers in section 8 of article 1:

> To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and to make rules concerning captures on land and water;
> To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years.

That reflects a certain and definite suspicion of setting up a great permanent military force.

> To provide and maintain a navy;
> To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

There are other powers relating to calling out, organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

The Constitution also provides that the President shall have power to make treaties, but only "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The President's relation to the Army is stated only in section 2 of article II:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

What possible basis is there for the claim that the President can enter into an agreement with foreign nations to set up an integrated international army under a centralized command, and to commit a certain number of American troops to that army without the approval of Congress?

It may be said he has acquired more power from the Atlantic Pact. But I think it is fully agreed now that the Atlantic Treaty did not commit us to the providing of any troops whatsoever and that under article 11 of the Pact the carrying out of the provisions of the Treaty must be in accordance with the respective constitutional processes of the country concerned. The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate stated expressly that the Treaty did not increase, decrease, or change the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, or impair the full authority of Congress to declare war. It is clear, therefore, that the President must look to his constitutional powers for the agreements that he has made or is proposing to make and there are no such constitutional powers.

Certainly an obligation to furnish armed forces to an integrated force for the defense of other countries has all the dignity of a treaty, and certainly it is not within the President's power as Commander in Chief.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. The distinguished Senator from Ohio certainly could help my thinking, if he would. On January 8, 1951, the President of the United States addressed a joint session of Congress. On that occasion the President was very positive in what he said. I would deeply appreciate the reaction of the Senator from Ohio to the observation made in very positive form by the President of the United States, in which he indicated to us and the American people that he had reason to believe that NATO military plans were in existence. He said:

> Together we have worked out defense plans. The military leaders of our own country took part in working out these plans, and are agreed that they are sound and within our capabilities.
> To put these plans into action, we sent to Europe last week one of our greatest military commanders, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.
> General Eisenhower went to Europe to assume command of the united forces of the North Atlantic Treaty countries, including our own forces in Germany.

Against what the President said so clearly and in such concrete fashion on January 8, I hope the Senator from Ohio will give us his reaction as to where and in what form he thinks such plans actually are.

Mr. TAFT. Frankly, I do not know. General Eisenhower testified before committees of both Houses of Congress, and either he did not know or he did not say. I understand he was asked what his own status was. He said he did not know. I think the Senator is correct. At least an official statement was issued in Brussels announcing that General Eisenhower had been appointed by the council. Whether the council had the right to make the appointment may be open to question. At least, that is the position he occupies. In any event, he did not seem to be certain of it himself.

Mr. CAIN. If I may, I should like to make one observation. I think the great contradiction in the minds of Members of Congress and the American people today is simply that the President of the United States on the 8th of January said that American military minds, in concert with their friends across the sea, had actually drafted a concerted plan of action for the future, and that General Eisenhower had gone to Europe to activate it. When General Eisenhower returned he said, as a very honest and frank individual, that he would not be able for some time to discuss in any detail any comprehensive, integrated plan for action in Europe, because at the moment one does not exist. He went so far as to say, "Please encourage me in what I want to do. I want to come back in about 6 months, and perhaps then I can begin to answer your very legitimate questions." If there is an integrated, comprehensive military plan for NATO and Western Europe, as the President has said exists and General Eisenhower has said is only in vague and preliminary form, no one has yet produced it for study by the Congress or the Nation.

Mr. TAFT. I have no objection to following such a course, provided the Senate is not asked next week to give the President unlimited power to send troops or to make any agreement regarding an international army. That seems to me to be the problem which we shall have to face in another week, without a single idea of what the plan is. I thought that perhaps the President was referring to a detailed military plan. Of course, we in Congress cannot determine where we are going to defend Europe, or anything of that kind.

However, it seems to me that we have before us the constitutional question of what it is that we are going to be asked to do. In other words, what is the nature of it? Are we going to commit troops to an international army, to serve under an international command? It so happens that the present commander in chief is an American. He could very well be a foreign general. The council would have the right to appoint someone else in General Eisenhower's place, if it wished to do so. My own feeling is that the whole subject is shrouded in uncertainty. If we are to pass on the subject it should be reduced to certain general and definite principles so that we can consider it on its merits.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. Bearing on the status of General Eisenhower, he was quoted in London—and I presume he was quoted accurately—as portraying himself, I trust somewhat facetiously, as only one-twelfth an American. I took it to apply to his status under the Council, to the effect that he recognized a responsibility, by implication, to 11 other countries. Is the Senator from Ohio familiar with that statement?

Mr. TAFT. No; I am not certain of it. However, the Brussels Council issued a communiqué saying that it had appointed General Eisenhower to head the army. That was what the communiqué said. I assume that is the authority under which the general is acting.

Certainly it seems also clear that as Commander in Chief he cannot delegate his command to a foreign government, or to 10 foreign governments, without the approval of Congress which has full power to make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

With regard to the sending of troops to Europe without any commitment no doubt the President has power to send divisions to occupy Germany, which it is our obligation to police and defend. But it can hardly be claimed that this power would justify sending more than two or three additional divisions. I have heretofore stated my opinion that the President cannot send an army to defend one country against another country which is attacked in the absence of any treaty, because it clearly involves us in war. Many cases have been cited against that view, because the President has actually landed troops in many countries in the past. In every case, however, the action was taken to protect American citizens or American property, and in no case has it been maintained that the President can even involve this country in war unless it is attacked.

There may be an argument that under the Atlantic Treaty if one of the Atlantic Pact nations is attacked, the President could send troops to defend it, but under article 11 of the treaty, it seems clear to me that the President's power to carry out the treaty is dependent upon a declaration of war by the Congress because clearly such action of the President would involve us in war. That roughly speaking, is the test as to the sending of troops abroad.

I do not say that the Congress by resolution or the Senate by the adoption of a treaty may not authorize the President to involve us in war without a congressional declaration of war. That certainly is a debatable question, but I do say without qualification that neither the Congress nor the Senate has given any such authority to the President. A somewhat similar authority was contemplated under the United Nations Charter, which was approved as a treaty, but the actual authority to send soldiers to an international army was limited by article 43 to the terms of a special agreement, and Congress provided that that agreement must be subject to approval by Congress.

Any other view means that the President today would have power to involve the United States in war in any section of the world in his unlimited and arbitrary discretion, and that Congress in creating a great American Armed Force of 3,500,000 men and drafting every boy of 18 for that purpose is completely without power to limit the President's arbitrary discretion. Merely to state this proposition should arouse the undying opposition of every man who believes in the maintenance in this country of government by the people.

It is rather interesting to note in Winston Churchill's second volume, Their Finest Hour, the reference to the opinion of Franklin D. Roosevelt on his own powers in this field. Mr. Roosevelt had written a letter to Monsieur Reynaud, the Premier of France, which Mr. Churchill thought could be construed as an agreement for America to join the French and British Governments in their defense against German aggression. Mr. Roosevelt hastened to disavow this conclusion, and Mr. Churchill in his book says that Roosevelt "then said he had told Ambassador Kennedy to inform me that his message of the fourteenth was in no sense intended to commit, and it did not commit the Government of the United States to military participation. There was no authority under the American Constitution except Congress which could make any commitment of that nature."

On February 15, 1848, Abraham Lincoln wrote his law partner, William H. Herndon, with reference to Polk's use of the Army against Mexico.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator from Ohio realizes, of course, that there was a different situation at that time. The President was assuring the Prime Minister and Mr. Reynaud that he could not commit troops to the war which was actually going on. The Senator realizes that the situation to which we are now referring is the business of putting troops there for the purpose of keeping the peace, and not to engage in conflict.

Mr. TAFT. Let me read what Abraham Lincoln said:

> Allow the President to invade a neighboring nation whenever he shall deem it necessary to repel an invasion, and you allow him to do so whenever he may choose to say he deems it necessary for such purpose, and you allow him to make war at pleasure. Study to see if you can fix any limit to his power in this respect. If today he should choose to say he thinks it necessary to invade Canada to prevent the British from invading us, how could you stop him? You may say to him, "I see no probability of the British invading us"; but he will say to you, "Be silent: I see it, if you don't." * * *
> The provision of the Constitution giving the war-making power to Congress was dictated, as I understand it, by the following reasons: Kings had always been involving and impoverishing their people in wars, pretending generally, if not always, that the good of the people was the object. This our convention understood to be the most oppressive of all kingly oppressions, and they resolved to so frame the Constitution that no one man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us. But your view destroys the whole matter, and places our President where kings have always stood.

It is argued that no one can stop the Commander in Chief from sending the Army anywhere he wants to send it. This argument only goes to his power, not to his right. If he has not the right, Congress can properly restrain him by law or resolution.

It is suggested the Congress should grant general authority to act in Europe because any such authority will be wisely used. Our experience in Korea does not support any such conclusion.

The confusion which surrounds the Brussels agreement raises the question whether the administration is trying to avoid congressional action by denying the existence of any agreement. I have pointed out that I do not think the President can send troops to Europe for the defense of Europe without congressional approval, even in the absence of a binding agreement. Apart from his right to contribute troops to an international army, however, it would certainly be most unwise to do so without a binding agreement. Surely, if we are going to participate in an international army for the defense of Western Europe, we want to be sure that the other nations will provide most of the soldiers. Before we send any troops, we should certainly have a binding contract to that effect from these other nations. General Eisenhower's speeches were both directed to the proposition that these nations are willing to undertake the principal burden of their own defense. In his broadcast, he said: "The European nations must, of course, produce and maintain the great bulk of the land forces necessary to their defense." He said: "By no means do I believe that we Americans can support the world militarily or economically. In our own interest we must insist upon a working partnership with every nation making the common security its task of first priority." In other words, if there is not an agreement, there ought to be an agreement. Whether there is or not, the project and any such agreement, are only lawful if approved by congressional action—not by any mere Senate resolution expressing the sense of the Senate, but by legislation in the form of a bill or joint resolution.

There is one final reason why this should be done. It is stated clearly in the report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the Atlantic Treaty where provision is made for the ratification or the carrying out of the treaty by the constitutional processes of the country involved:

> It has been questioned whether a treaty subordinating action to the constitutional principles of 12 democratic nations offers sufficient certainty and immediacy of action effectively to deter aggression. The committee is convinced that it does. The expression of the will of a whole people offers far more certainty than any commitment by a dictator.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. Am I correct in my recollection that the Senator from Ohio was quoted in the press as saying that he would be in favor of a limited number of American divisions?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I am coming to that. I believe very strongly in the necessity of this Government carrying out its promises lawfully made. Whatever project may be approved by Congress, whether I agree with it or not, will have my support in future years. But if the President undertakes to make promises which he has no right to make, I feel no obligation to support those promises. There will never be unity behind the proposal unless it is constitutionally approved. The only path to unity is to obtain the approval of Congress to a definite program or agreement relating to the use of American armies in Europe in time of peace.

I therefore intend, if any general resolution is brought in, to support the Wherry resolution, and also to offer a further amendment providing that no agreement relating to the furnishing of American troops to an integrated European army formed under the Atlantic Pact shall be valid until it is approved by Congress. I do not mean to propose that every military detail be contained in such an agreement, but certainly the size of the army and the basis of national contributions should be clearly specified. These facts will under no circumstances remain military secrets, and they form the very basis of the character of the entire project, and of every other major proposal before Congress.

2. TO WHAT EXTENT DO WE ALL AGREE ON CERTAIN FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATING TO COMMUNIST AGGRESSION IN THE WORLD, AND IN PARTICULAR TO EUROPE?

There have been a good many misunderstandings with regard to the issues which we here face, and as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has pointed out, there are many areas of agreement.

A. No one is proposing that we abandon Europe or run out on Europe or invite the Communists to take over Europe. We have assisted Western Europe continuously for many years. We helped many of the countries by lend-lease during the war. Many loans and grants were made after the war. Under ECA, billions have been freely given in unprecedented generosity to build up the economic life and the industrial potentiality of Western Europe so that today production is approximately 40 percent over prewar. We have appropriated billions to provide armament with which these nations may defend themselves, and no one has questioned that principle since it was adopted by Congress in the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

B. We have entered into the Atlantic Treaty under which we have agreed to go to war if any nation attacks a member of the pact. No one is even considering a withdrawal from that obligation. I certainly believe in carrying out the promises we have made; I did so even when I voted against making them. This means also that, if Russia or any of its satellites in Eastern Germany, Poland, or Czechoslovakia attacks Germany we will go to war with the aggressor. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee in its report on the North Atlantic Treaty says:

> It should be noted that Germany receives some protection since the treaty covers armed attack upon occupation forces.

One question does arise which perhaps should be determined by the members of the Atlantic Pact. If East Germany or Poland attacks the occupied zones in Germany or any of the pact nations, do we go to war with the satellite which makes the attack, or do we regard such an attack as an attack by Russia itself involving a war with Russia? Should we give a definite notification to Russia that an attack by certain countries will be regarded as an attack by Russia itself? Such a notification might be a deterrent to the beginning of a limited war in Germany which in the end would almost certainly lead to general war anyway. The Atlantic Pact nations should adopt some policy also regarding an attack on Yugoslavia so that snap judgment is not taken at some midnight conference.

C. There is no doubt that the freedom of Europe is of vital interest to the United States. There would be a much greater threat to our own liberty if Western Europe were conquered by Soviet Russia. No one questions that conclusion and, of course, it is the only justification for spending billions on ECA, and on armament for Europe, and for the agreement to go to war if Europe is attacked. It does not follow, however, that because we desire the freedom of every country in the world we must send an American land army to that country to defend it. Western Europe, after all, has more people in it than we have in the United States and is completely able to defend itself if we furnish the armament and if it desires to do so.

There is a good deal of confusion as to exactly what would happen to Europe in case Russia should attack, and arguments have been made on behalf of this program on the theory that in some way Europe would be entirely taken over by the Communists, and that that would involve the rest of the world. If Russia should attack, obviously there would at once be a general war. We would be engaged in bombing the Russian bases. Any army, whether we contributed troops to it or not, would probably have to retreat to the Rhine and make a stand there against Russian aggression. England and France and Germany west of the Rhine presumably would be bombed by the Russians, and Russia and Eastern Germany by the Allies. If France were overrun as they were by the Germans, this time presumably a Free French Government would retreat to Africa and continue to perform its obligations under the Atlantic Pact. It is inconceivable to me that the Russians could conquer Great Britain. I see no reason to suppose that the industrial potentiality or the skilled labor of all Western Europe—which have been stressed so much—would be at any time available to Soviet Russia. In case of war, much of the industrial power might be destroyed in Russia, Germany, and France. We know that after the last war only the tremendous assistance of the United States and the ECA brought about the restoration of industrial power.

Nor does it follow because of a Russian success on the Continent that we would be cut off from any raw materials, either in the Belgian Congo or in Indonesia. In short, General Eisenhower and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and John Gunther somewhat exaggerate the danger of an unsuccessful war in Europe. But I fully agree that we are vitally concerned with the continued freedom of England, France, Italy, and the other Atlantic Pact countries, as well as Germany.

It is certainly vitally important that we do not exhaust our resources on a vast land army in Europe and neglect to any extent the sea and air power and the supporting armed troops necessary to protect these sources of raw material upon which General Eisenhower lays so much stress. But it can be said that the serious difference regarding the importance of the defense of Western Europe is the extent to which the establishment of a great international army with many American divisions is effective for that purpose during the intermediate period, and whether it commits the American people to something beyond their power of fulfillment.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if the opinions he has expressed in regard to the military situation are based upon advice given to him by military men; or are they his own personal opinions?

Mr. TAFT. What particular opinion does the general—I mean the Senator from Arizona—wish to ask me about?

Mr. McFARLAND. I disclaim being a general. I know we have many "generals" on the floor, "experts" in regard to military matters, but I disclaim anything like that. I give the Senator from Ohio credit for being one.

Mr. TAFT. I have talked to a good many generals, some of very high rank. We have received advice from military critics. I certainly have not ventured to go into anything but the most general principles in asserting any military opinion in this connection. I do not know what the Senator from Arizona has in mind.

Mr. McFARLAND. The Senator just stated that if Europe was involved in a war with Russia we would also be involved in it.

Mr. TAFT. We would be at war with them. We would be fighting.

Mr. McFARLAND. That would be true regardless of whether we had troops there or whether we did not have troops there. The Senator concedes that; does he not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes.

Mr. McFARLAND. Then, the Senator from Ohio proceeds to outline what the military situation would be, and what would be the result of such a war if it should break out. I was wondering if the Senator was giving his own personal opinion as to those matters or whether it was based upon the advice of military experts.

Mr. TAFT. The only opinion I remember off hand expressing was that if there were such a war, it would involve bombing on both sides, and to a large extent the destruction of the industrial potential of Europe, the use of which by Russia was one of the things held up to us as being completely fatal in a war between Russia and the United States. I simply suggest that if war should start that industrial potential would probably never be available to the Russians.

Mr. McFARLAND. Is that the opinion of the military men, or is that the Senator's personal opinion?

Mr. TAFT. No; I do not think that is particularly a military question. We saw what happened in the last war. We know that when the war ended the industries of France and of England were unable to go ahead without many billions of dollars from the United States—amounts which Russia probably could never furnish. That is a mere conclusion. That particular conclusion I formed for myself. As to where and when fighting might take place, I have talked to some generals.

Mr. McFARLAND. I merely wanted to know what the source of the Senator's opinion was.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator from Arizona question my conclusion?

Mr. McFARLAND. I am not questioning it, nor am I conceding it. I am not setting myself up as a general—a term the Senator has just applied to me. Yes; I might question the Senator's conclusion. I might question some of the things the Senator has to say. But I would not want to set myself up as a military expert or a "general," by which term the Senator has just addressed me. I believe it takes a military expert to pass upon many of the questions the Senator is speaking about in his address today.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, so far as I know, I have not tried to establish any great military principles which are not accepted generally by everybody writing on military or cognate subjects. I do not know that I have laid down any general principles that will not command respect, so far as the military aspects of the situation are concerned. Like the Senator from Arizona, I do not venture into detailed prediction of what military operations are to be undertaken.

D. Of course, there is now general agreement that control of the sea and air is our primary field in war with Russia; and that we cannot also assume the major burden of any great land army. That is clearly stated by General Eisenhower. Control of air, sea, and the Eurasian Continent is probably beyond our power. If we commit ourselves to more than we can carry out, we weaken the whole Nation and we weaken the effectiveness of every branch of the armed services including our sea and air forces.

If we provide sea and air support plus all of the equipment required for land forces, plus five divisions of land troops, we will certainly be doing 50 percent of the entire job. Unless these nations together are willing to defend themselves by providing the other 50 percent, I do not believe that any integrated army could be successful. If we provided half of that land army, our total share in the entire operation would probably run up to 80 percent. We do not want to find ourselves again as in Korea, doing substantially the entire job, because we cannot possibly do it.

E. There is general agreement that the whole project is dependent upon substantial action by European nations and by high morale. May I say that I have never questioned that morale. The distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] based most of his criticism of my speech on the theory that I said that the European nations would not fight. Others have indicated their doubt on this subject, and even General Eisenhower does not seem to be certain; but I said nothing to indicate any belief on my part that England and France were not vitally interested in their own defense. I am glad to have General Eisenhower's assurance that their morale is steadily increasing. I notice, however, that he is not completely certain. He said, "We must make sure that the heart and soul of Europe is ripe. That is one of the obligations certainly that is imposed upon me and my staff." In other words, there is still something to be done in the future in this field. His whole report is an expression of hope, and a hope that I feel confident will be justified; but he spends part of his time explaining why France is completely occupied in Indochina, and why any further sacrifices impose a reduction in their standard of living, already low. In any event, I am quite willing to accept the principle that Europe is ready to go ahead; but I do insist upon definite promises from them as to the part which they will play in the project.

F. There is general agreement that this country can overcommit itself and thereby weaken its whole economic structure and interfere not only with our morale, but with the important function of providing equipment for Europe. General Eisenhower repeatedly says that we cannot carry the world on our shoulders like Atlas. The General Staff, I think, clearly recognizes that there is a practical limit to our Armed Forces. They have rejected the idea of 6,000,000 men, as proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and have fixed a goal of 3,500,000 men. I have said myself that I believe 3,000,000 is about the limit that we can wisely provide for a permanent standing army, navy, and air force over a long period of years. The present estimate is that this force of 3,500,000 men will cost us $40,000,000,000 in cash in fiscal 1952, but that the cost will increase. I think we can assume that it will increase to at least $55,000,000,000 a year for several years, which means a total expenditure on the President's budget, including nondefense expenditures, of $85,000,000,000. Even with great economy in nondefense expenditures, the budget would be $80,000,000,000 and would require $25,000,000,000 more in taxes. Even now the President does not dare to recommend taxes to meet the $71,000,000,000 expenditure which he proposes. I do not see how we can today raise taxes beyond, say, about $65,000,000,000 a year without hardship and injustice and danger to the economy of the country. Whatever the amount, there is a general agreement that some limit on our commitments must be imposed either by the President or Congress. I believe it should be by Congress, that it is our constitutional duty to decide that question.

4. IS THE PROGRAM A WISE PROGRAM AND, IF SO, SHOULD ITS LIMITATIONS BE CLEARLY STATED?

For these reasons and for other reasons stated in my speech of January 5, I am opposed in principle to undertaking a land force on the continent of Europe. As I stated then, however, we do have two divisions already in Europe; and I would not object to a few more divisions, simply to show the Europeans that we are interested and will participate in the more difficult job of land warfare while we carry out also our larger obligations. This is particularly true because the President has gone so far in his unauthorized promises that a withdrawal now will affect badly the morale of the European's interest in his own defense.

I can restate briefly my objections to any large American participation in an integrated European army.

A. I believe that the formation of such an army and its location in Germany along the iron curtain line, particularly one headed by an American general and dependent primarily on American strength, is bound to have an aggressive aspect to the Russians. We would be going a long way from home, and very close to the Russian border. If we merely help France arm in France and England arm in England, it is hard to see how Russia could object; but a great army in Germany is undoubtedly a threat to their present dominion. Of course our purposes are purely defensive, but a first-class defensive army must also be an offensive army. Today, armies do not stand still—either one advances or the other advances. Russia cannot reasonably fear from this proposed army an attack on Moscow; but if the army can hold the Russian Army at all, it could make advances into the eastern zones of Germany or Austria, or Czechoslovakia or Poland. It has therefore seemed to me that the formation of this army is more an incitement to Russia to go to war, rather than a deterrent. They have not been deterred by land soldiers up to this time because there have been no land soldiers; and if they have been deterred at all it has been through our Air Force and the power to drop atom bombs on Russia. If Russia is contemplating a military attack in Western Europe, why does not the present plan give them an incentive to attack at once, or in 1952? Apparently it will take at least 2 years to provide 40 divisions, and no one thinks that is enough. On the other hand, if Russia is not contemplating a military attack, this proposal might incite it to do so, when otherwise a gradual increase in strength could be achieved among Western European nations without danger of war. I have repeatedly asked the question with reference to this temporary period of 2 or 3 years during which we are building up an army on the borders of Russia, before it is sufficient in the opinion of military experts to withstand a Russian attack: If Russia is planning a military attack at any time in the future, why will they wait during this period?

B. The whole defense program seems a very hazy one to a layman, and I know it is considered by many military experts to be impracticable as far as the defense of Germany east of the Rhine is concerned. It is useless to talk about defending the line of the Elbe, because the Russian zone, with strong military positions, extends halfway from the Elbe to the Rhine already. Today it is within approximately 80 miles, I think, of Dusseldorf. A defense of Europe to the Rhine means that Russia will control the Ruhr and much of Germany's industry. To defend completely the British and American zones and Denmark would apparently require at least 75 divisions, and no one is proposing to develop that number. Therefore, it seems useless to talk about the defense of large sections of Western Germany for a good many years to come, or to expect the Germans to participate until a much larger number of divisions are available than now seem to be in sight. That appears to be the position of the Adenauer government. The defense of Germany at the Rhine would endanger Holland and place France, Belgium, and England themselves in easy reach of Russian short-distance bombs, and perhaps of the atom bomb itself. I am not at all a defeatist as to the ultimate ability of Europe to defend itself, but I would prefer to wait until each of these countries has built up a very considerable force of its own, and until Germany is independent and arming itself, before we attempt to establish a military position with an integrated army.

C. When it is possible to do that, however, there is still a question in my mind whether we should even then commit any considerable number of American forces to that European army. The effect of it is to commit us to a major war on the continent of Europe against Russia, and that will inevitably be the major project to which most of our limited resources will have to be devoted. The larger the force we station there, the more we are committed to fighting such a war to the bitter end in Europe and putting more of our energy into that part of the contest, postponing or neglecting the job that ought to be done elsewhere to assure our raw materials and lines of communication. We would be fighting Russia on a battlefield most favorable to them, and one where we would always be outnumbered in manpower. It is said repeatedly that wars can only be won by land soldiers. That may be true, but it is no longer absolutely certain. It was complete control of sea and air which enabled us to take over the smaller islands of the Pacific, and it was the same control which enabled us to take over Japan without landing a soldier. Possibly a third world war could be won from the air. It is also doubtful whether a victorious nation gains much from physical occupation after destroying the industries of the vanquished. Possibly in the end, Mr. President, we might decide that the only way to win a war is to build again an army of 10,000,000 men and march to Moscow; but certainly we cannot have any such army in being at the beginning of the war, and it may never be necessary. Our military authorities are too apt to think that a third world war will be just like the Second World War; but a new war is never like the one that preceded it.

D. Finally, I believe that the undertaking of a project in Europe which is not strictly limited would lead to a constant demand for a larger and larger land army. Senator Douglas evidently realizes that to carry out the project would require 6,000,000 men under arms, as he proposes, instead of the 3,500,000, which the administration is now asking for. The Army plan is for 1,400,000 men, or 27 divisions, in the United States—the total land army of the United States. It seems to me it would be unsafe to station a large proportion of that army in Europe. We require troops in this country to protect us against attack from the air, and we require troops in Alaska and in the Far East. There should certainly be mobile forces to protect air bases in Africa and elsewhere in the world and to go to the assistance of other nations which request assistance if the project is important and practical. If we are going to have to station 15 divisions in Europe, we probably need closer to 45 divisions overall in our Army, instead of 27. That would add another 1,000,000 men and perhaps $13,000,000,000 for maintenance and equipment.

At present the administration is trying to play down the requirements of this program and, of course, is not even telling us what the program is, at least beyond the year 1951. We have seen this process constantly repeated. We were told that Bretton Woods would solve the financial problems of Europe. Within a few months it became apparent that the British loan was necessary. That was followed by other aid, and then by the Marshall plan. In every case the next step was said to be essential in order to maintain the morale of Europe against communism. Then came the Atlantic Pact, our obligation to go to war, and the commitment of small sums to the arming of European countries. Then the appropriations for arms had to be quadrupled. Now we are told that the morale of Europe will collapse unless we send at least three or four more divisions in 1951. So long as we encourage the idea of constantly increasing aid to Europe, and do not pin down the size of the European army and the extent of the contributions of the European nations, there will be every year a new demand again urged as essential to save the value of all that has been done before. It seems to me that we should definitely notify the European nations the limit of what we can do so that they may make their plans on that basis. There is this tremendous difference today over the past. What we are proposing to do stretches the capacity of the people of the United States to the very limit in 1951 and many years thereafter. The program, even on its present scale, proposes to take all 18-year-old boys for 27 months service in the Army, while General Eisenhower is praising France highly for instituting universal service for 18 months. We have the lion's share of the job of producing munitions, and we are short of manpower for that purpose. We cannot upset our system by taxes so heavy as to interfere with that job. We hear much of the need of bolstering up the morale of Europe. The tremendous taxes and long universal service may have a substantial effect on the morale of the people of the United States. Even now the President is soft-pedalling his tax request, because he is afraid the people will not take an increase sufficient to balance the budget which he has submitted.

If, therefore, Congress decides to proceed with this project of contributing American troops to an integrated army in Europe under a centralized command, then I believe certain limitations should clearly be imposed. I would suggest that the American contribution be not more than 1 American division to 9 foreign divisions—that is 5 American divisions to an army of 50, or 6 American divisions to an army of 60, and that it be undertaken only as and when foreign nations bind themselves to provide the divisions determined to be necessary for an adequate defense. I also suggest tentatively a provision that not more than 20 percent of the land army of the United States and not more than 10 percent of the Air Force be stationed on the continent of Europe in time of peace. These limitations, I believe, should be attached to any authority given the President to set up an integrated army in Europe and commit American troops to that army.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, let me say that no one is more determined to resist Communist aggression in the world than I am. I think the Russians present a menace to the liberty of the entire world and to our way of life, a menace greater than we have faced before in our history. That menace is not entirely military. It is a battle of liberty against communism in the minds of men. We cannot afford to destroy at home the very liberty which we must sell to the rest of the world as the basis for progress and happiness.

There is no reason whatever for panic or defeatism. I feel less concern about the ultimate success of Russian military power than do many others. But if they choose to start a war, it will be a long and bitter conflict, and this country must remain strong in every aspect of production and morale. Our limited resources must be directed to the field where they can be most effective. I do not believe that Western Europe can be defended unless the Western Europeans are determined to defend themselves and take the intiative in rearming which is essential for that purpose. To encourage that action, we are furnishing them with economic assistance and military equipment in practically any amount which they request. We will support them by sea and by air, and I would agree to send some troops to prove to them that we do intend to fight at their side if Russia attacks. But even the program which I outline will require tremendous sacrifices from the American people, from every taxpayer, from every family, from every boy. We should not further endanger the position of America as the arsenal of democracy and the bastion of liberty.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, before I commence my address, I desire to express my appreciation of the splendid presentation we have just heard by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] on this very important and difficult subject. The Senator's remarks indicate to me that it is vitally important that any decisions arrived at with regard to this important question of foreign policy be considered fully and completely by the Congress of the United States.

I have contended from the beginning that, irrespective of the constitutional aspects of the question as to whether the President had the power to send troops without consulting the Congress, he would be making a critical mistake if the Congress were not fully consulted and if appropriate action were not taken to support such a policy. What we need today is the confidence and support of public opinion in America. We need the support of the American people. The only way we can have that support is for the representatives of the people in the Congress to have an opportunity to participate in the development of such an important piece of foreign policy as is involved in this debate.

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I have felt it incumbent upon me to try to follow in detail and to study carefully the contributions which have been made to this subject. I have studied the original speech made by Mr. Herbert Hoover last December, and the speeches which followed, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], by Mr. John Foster Dulles, by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the contributions made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], and other Senators, including the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], my colleague. It was my purpose originally to cover in my remarks today not only the European question, but also to cover some of the problems presented by the situation in Asia, and especially in Korea. But I realize that that is a very large field, and therefore I have decided to limit myself today to the so-called Eisenhower report, and to what I believe to be his purposes, from my talks with him and from my reading of his address and his broadcast, and also to discuss certain aspects of the so-called cold war.

I hope that next week, or probably sometime later, I can discuss certain aspects of the Asian problem, especially the crisis in Korea. I think it is too large an order to cover both those problems in one address. So, Mr. President, I shall turn, first, to the situation in Europe, primarily to the matter which the distinguished Senator from Ohio has been discussing.

I think, generally speaking, I could agree with the approach of the Senator from Ohio if it had been put in a positive form as a warning to us in considering the issues involved in the whole question of our European participation. As I heard him, I rather felt, I am frank to say, that his remarks were on the negative side. He emphasized the difficulties rather than, in the first instance, realizing that the problem facing us from the standpoint of world security is one of finding positive ways of meeting those difficulties.

I want to stress first certain conclusions which, it seems to me, we have to accept after hearing General Eisenhower, and after studying the critical problems facing us. I am convinced that the North Atlantic Treaty countries—and this is the reason why the treaty was established—must stand together and mobilize together. I cannot see any possible alternative to that. I believe the Senator from Ohio would probably agree with that statement, although I would probably go further in the development of that mobilization than he would.

My next thought, Mr. President, is that probably the spirit and determination of the European countries are dependent to a large degree upon our leadership. I am sorry for that, but I feel that it is true. We emerged from World War II unscathed, in a way, because we did not feel the brunt of the destruction caused by the war. We are looked to, because of the stronger position we are in, at least to give the sense of leadership which the other free nations need.

General Eisenhower brought out the fact that the spirit and determination of European nations were dependent to a large degree on our willingness to provide—what? In the first place, arms and ammunition. Those nations do not have arms and ammunition, nor do they yet have adequate facilities to produce them. Whatever emphasis General Eisenhower may have placed on manpower, his first and strongest emphasis was on arms and ammunition. Then he referred to a reasonable ratio of troops in order to give assurance to those nations that we would participate and not merely contribute material aid.

In studying his statement, and in talking with him, I received a further impression. I thoroughly believe he was right in the way in which he presented the case to us. His investigation indicated that it is too soon now to define the numbers of troops, either the overall number or the ratios that can be furnished by the contributing countries, including the United States. He was in Europe for about 3 weeks, and he said to us, frankly, that he could not in that short period of time get all the information on which he could form a considered judgment. He was still engaged in the planning stage and had not yet reached the point where he could present an intelligent and concrete program.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. THYE. As I heard the remarks of General Eisenhower, and I am sure the Senator from New Jersey will concur with me, he stated that the European Continent had the men, but that what we want to do is to place rifles in their hands.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is true, but he did not preclude our participation with men to a reasonable extent. He did, however, emphasize the fact that to a large extent they have the men and we have the rifles and ammunition.

Mr. President, let me state another thing that impressed me. I have not seen it reported by any commentator or given any publicity, but it was very clear to me from what he said and from what I gathered from my conversation with him before he went abroad—and this is not violating any confidence—that General Eisenhower felt we could deal with the subject using the same approach which we used with the Marshall plan. We would probably have to have a larger participation at the beginning, until the European nations were built up. As by degrees their defenses were perfected, we could ease off in our participation. He said it would probably be possible to have a flexible and decreasing program so that we would not be facing a permanent program of 15 or 20 years in which we would have substantial numbers of troops continuously stationed in Europe and dedicated to European service.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is not pleasant to be seemingly the devil's advocate, but in the words which were quoted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] and agreed to by the Senator from New Jersey, the American people have indelibly impressed upon their recollection the words of Winston Churchill, which were:

> Give us the tools and we will do the job.

We have also the recollection of Korea in connection with which the United Nations overwhelmingly voted for our embarking upon the enterprise, in which their participation has been almost negligible. Does the Senator from New Jersey feel that in the minds of the American people there must be very tangible evidence that neither of those episodes is going to be repeated?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think the point raised by the Senator from Maine is entirely correct. We have to make as clear as we can what our commitments will be. I agreed with what the Senator from Ohio said, to the extent that when the program is developed it should be brought up for consideration and approval before it is arbitrarily put into effect by the President of the United States. I do not know what the Senator from Maine means with reference to convincing the people. Of course, we must have public opinion behind us, and we are trying to prevent either arbitrary or unwise action.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I appreciate what the Senator from New Jersey said as to the necessity of satisfying the people of America that we are going to go forward in a cooperative mood. The formula which I would follow in connection with it, in the light of the two episodes to which I have referred, which have caused very serious concern, is as follows:

> What you do speaks so loudly, I cannot hear what you say.

Those are the words of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Moreover, I would remind the Senator of the old adage that actions speak louder than words.

The American people, if I may add a metaphor, like a "singed cat"——

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think the Senator's comment is relevant, but I was wondering whether the Senator implies that we should do nothing until we have complete agreement on what should be undertaken.

Mr. BREWSTER. Not at all. We have had two recent experiences in which words have far outrun deeds. We have great confidence in General Eisenhower and in his capacity to survey the situation, but I think it would be a grave disservice to the cause of world peace if our European friends should understand that in America there are not serious misgivings with reference to embarking upon this enterprise. General Eisenhower was unable to give us specific information relative to the contribution of the other countries and of our country. He said it was impossible to do so either from the standpoint of their economy or their military laws. That adds to the difficulty of understanding. So that the more the nations of Europe can do to show us that they mean business, the easier it will be for us who recognize the great importance of Europe and the very great desire to defend freedom everywhere in the world.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator. In answer to his statement, I have here a quotation from General Eisenhower's speech, which I read:

> What we are trying to do is * * * to start a sort of reciprocal action across the Atlantic. * * * We establish an upward-going spiral between this problem of strength and morale. * * * The only thing that can defeat us is to establish a descending spiral, born of suspicion, unreadiness on the part of each of us to do his job, the job that he knows in his heart he must do. * * *
> We must make sure that the heart and the soul of Europe is ripe. That is one of the obligations certainly that is imposed upon me and my staff. * * * But we must not watch that so closely that we fail to get out in front to provide the leadership that will make this thing a complete success.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, the general also said that it is developing into a situation in which we must not look over our shoulders to see whether the others are doing their part.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I do not recall that statement, but I do recall that he very distinctly hoped to come back within a period of a few months and report to us whether or not in his judgment the Europeans were doing the things which they had undertaken to do. I think that was very important.

Mr. BREWSTER. There can be no question about that. Apropos of the question of looking over our shoulders, I am sure that the boys in Korea are looking over their shoulders to see whether or not they are getting the assistance which they were apparently pledged they would get by the action of the United Nations, which assistance has been conspicuously lacking in the past 7 months. I think we would be doing a very serious disservice to the entire cause if we did not realize that such considerations are being weighed in the minds and hearts of the American people. We cannot say that we should not be suspicious or doubtful, when boys are dying in Korea because we will not let the Chinese Nationalists go to their aid.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Maine has said in that respect, and I shall go into the subject further a little later on in my address.

Mr. President, continuing my analysis of what I understand to be General Eisenhower's position, as I said, I interpret what he said to me and what he said in his speech to mean that what is needed now is to get under way the mobilization of the North Atlantic countries that is needed for the collective defense of Europe. As European nations develop military strength and as such strength grows from the inside, there will be less and less call on us for help, as in the case of the Marshall plan. Under the Marshall plan we established a 4-year program. It will be wound up in 1952. In other words, our program now is to join with these European countries and start the ball rolling, to get the program under way. It is not expected of us to keep a permanent army in Europe. I am sure that is the feeling General Eisenhower had.

Mr. President, as I announced a few moments ago, and as has been brought out by questioning by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], General Eisenhower said the greatest need today is for arms and equipment. He also said—and I think this is very important—that our contribution must be within the limit of our resources, and our system must remain solvent. That is what the general said:

> Our system must remain solvent.

The general will be governed by that fundamental principle, which was also referred to by the Senator from Ohio in his address this morning.

Mr. President, I said before that the American people must be behind the program. Without congressional approval I do not believe any program can succeed. So I continue to restate my position, that irrespective of the constitutional question of whether or not the President has the power to send troops, in my judgment it would be fatal if he did not consult Congress and get congressional approval before any troops were sent. That is the spirit of the Wherry resolution. I believe it is the spirit of the American people today. If the letters and telegrams which have come to me are any indication of what the American people are thinking, that is their spirit today. The spirit of the American people is that we should work together in developing a policy for setting up a European army to help defend the bastion of liberty throughout the world.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to say to the very able Senator from New Jersey that my mail indicates the same thing. It shall be my determination to make certain that Congress will know what our Nation is committed to do, and that there shall not be the secret agreements entered into which we have witnessed in the past. I am determined to see to it that it will not happen in the future, if I can do something about it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I agree entirely with the Senator. I think his position is perfectly sound. I may say that in my judgment, while under article 9 of the North Atlantic Pact the United States and the Western European countries have been considering what kind of set-up we should have, I am satisfied that General Eisenhower does not feel bound by any commitments. He told me that, so far as he knew, there were no commitments which in any way bound him, and that he would have a free hand to determine what the whole picture should be, what planning should be undertaken, and what the participation of each nation should be. When that has been determined, and when we know what General Eisenhower thinks each nation should and can do in the common effort—and all that must be done before we are called upon to contribute anything—it will be time for us to consider how many troops we should provide, in what ratio, and similar questions.

I am frank to say that I was very much impressed by General Eisenhower's approach. It seemed to me to be the correct one. He indicated that he would come back for approval of any program that should be carried out. In the meantime, of course, there is no reason why our production should not be stepped up. We will need war materials whether we send them abroad or keep them here. Our whole military program must be accelerated. It is perfectly proper for an expanded selective service draft to go into effect, so that we can be ready, when the time comes, to make the best disposition of our strength.

Mr. President, I should like to point out one danger which I see. General Eisenhower emphasized it, among others. It is that we must be careful not to try to dominate the whole program. We must look to the other people who are working with us to take part in the program and to accept their share of the responsibility of setting it up. It must not be looked upon as though we were dominating the entire program. The Senator from Ohio pointed that out. I have no doubt that General Eisenhower is the ablest man to head the program. That does not mean that we must run the whole show. That does not mean that it must all be done under our dictation and with complete disregard of other countries. We must not do so, or they may very well take the position, "the United States is going to do it all. We can just sit back." That is the danger, as I see it. I shall speak further on this subject of domination, as distinguished from leadership, before I conclude my remarks today.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word about Germany. On my trip to Europe last fall, to attend the Interparliamentary Conference in Dublin, and then during my visits to London and Paris, my discussions with the leaders of the various countries which I visited indicated there was a strong feeling, which I shared, that Western Germany was an important part of this whole European army set-up. Understandable difficulties confronted some countries, especially France, which had been invaded so frequently, in approving any sort of German Army. There has been widespread discussion of divisions being organized in Germany which might be made a part of a larger army.

General Eisenhower has convinced me that any discussion of Germany's contribution to a European army is probably a mistake until a political solution is worked out. There is no use precipitating differences of opinion. For the moment, at least, we do not need to move into that particular problem. It can wait until the political questions are solved and until such time as the German people definitely feel they want to be a part of a western European set-up, until they wish to come in voluntarily, and not under any pressures or any feeling of compulsion because they were the conquered nation in the last war.

As General Eisenhower pointed out, they should be looked upon as equals when they do come in. He specifically spoke of "equality." He said that they should have some divisions of their own, with their own leadership, but, of course, with adequate safeguards provided against their ever developing again a militant spirit for aggressive nationalistic purposes.

Therefore, Mr. President, after reviewing, as I have, what I take to be General Eisenhower's approach, I am glad to state that I find myself in accord with the point of view he presents. He is not suggesting a program in the sense that it is worked out in detail. He is investigating what may be needed and developing a program that he is going to bring back to us for approval. We have not yet reached the final stage of making military commitments, nor are we going to give blank checks. I would not do that.

I think the Senator from Ohio was right in calling attention to that. I have found nothing in his words of caution with which I would not agree. But I think the time will come when General Eisenhower will come back to us with a program for a certain-sized European army, if there is to be one—and I think there should be one. He will tell us the contributions to be made by the various contributing countries. He will tell us how much they can aid, based upon his own studies; and he will have suggestions as to what part we can play in that particular program when the plan comes to us for approval.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like, at the appropriate point in the Senator's discussion, to refer to the situation in the Mediterranean. I do not know whether it would come more appropriately now or later.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think I would prefer to finish my discussion of Europe, because my points are arranged in sequence, and I am afraid that if I interrupt my presentation, what I am trying to develop will not be clear in the RECORD.

I wish now to move from my interpretation of General Eisenhower's over-all approach to a discussion of strategy. I do this with great humility, because I am only a layman. However, because of my interest in the subject, I have been discussing the matter with various persons. I have been discussing the question of the possible strategy so far as all of Europe is concerned, and, in fact, so far as the world is concerned.

The Senator from Ohio referred to the difficulties involved in trying to meet force with force, and the danger, if we arm now, of our stimulating an attack by Russia. I should like to explore that subject for a moment.

I suggest that the basis of our strategy is to deter the Russians from aggression by building our own strength to the point where aggression would be too costly for the Russians. As I see it, this is the key of our policy position. I am not talking about establishing a ground army that can, by itself, resist an attack by the Russians. I want an over-all strength sufficiently great to deter them from risking the attack. So I am going to call our policy the building up of deterrent power. I underline the words "deterrent power."

This deterrent power should have three elements. As a layman I am not competent to judge military strategy, but I have discussed the subject very fully with military authorities and others who have studied it. What I am submitting is, to a considerable extent, the result of the conversations which I have had. I believe that it is well worthy of careful exploration. I think it is the spirit of the Atlantic Pact idea of collective defense against aggression.

This deterrent power, as I have said, must have three elements:

First, the power of strategic retaliation. This includes not only our atomic-bombing force, but all other weapons and techniques whereby, if Russia should start a global war, we could carry that war—where? To her own homeland. The power of strategic retaliation is very important, so that Russia will know perfectly well that if she starts world war III, a global war, we can carry our defense, through retaliation, to her own homeland. That, to my mind, is the most potent deterrent to war today. I remember Mr. Churchill saying to me when I was in London, "The one thing that has prevented world war III has been the control of the atomic bomb by the United States." The point I am making relates to the power of strategic retaliation in case Russia should start a war.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. One question occurs to me. In the event Russia should attack the United States, and should choose to attack us by air, she would be attempting to lay waste our strength by destroying our industrial plants and communications. Let us assume that such an approach were from the north, across Canada, from Alaska, or in the Pacific area. If such an approach were made, and a sufficient number of planes, loaded with atomic bombs, were sent to our shores Russia would naturally hope that she could get a few planes through—one to New York City, one to Chicago, one to the Twin Cities area, one to San Francisco, and one to Los Angeles, for example. If only a few planes, with atomic bombs, got through, they could lay waste our strength immediately.

If such an attack occurred upon this continent, in the United States, would it not then be to our advantage to have bases on the European continent so that we could immediately make an attack upon Russia, without the necessity of a long flight from the United States across the Atlantic to the mainland or the real heart of Russia? That is the picture as I see it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator is correct. It is a part of the strategy of retaliation, to be in a position where we can do that from available bases. We require such bases if our plans are to be carried out.

Mr. THYE. That is why western Europe is so important in the entire world defense against communistic aggression. The peace of civilization and the freedom of religion are involved in whether we stop the Russian communistic aggression or whether that aggression is permitted to overpower one nation after another. It seems to me that our strength will lie in how strong the countries of western Europe are made.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Doubtless the Senator would agree with my suggestion that one of the elements in deterrent power is the power of strategic retaliation from properly located bases, so that we could attack at once with our atomic strength.

Mr. THYE. I have followed very closely the comments of the able Senator from New Jersey. I am very much in agreement with his views and ideas. That is why I was prompted to make the comments which I made about what it seems to me we must accomplish. We must strengthen the countries of western Europe militarily to such an extent that they can stand as bases from which we start, if the intent of Russia is ultimately to strike at this great, strong nation in order that the Russians may have a better opportunity of spreading communism to all corners of the world.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THYE. The United States stands today as one nation which in the past has demonstrated its ability to produce the implements of war. Russia recognizes that. She also recognizes our ability to encourage men to fight when the time calls for a fight. For that reason, if Russia attacks at all, she will attack our industrial heart, and not attack in any other manner. She will dissipate our strength, as she is doing in Korea and elsewhere, but when the final hour comes, if Russia wants to attack, she will not attack anywhere but at the very heart of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. THYE. We must be able to retaliate decisively or Russia will succeed in her endeavors.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Will the Senator wait until I finish the discussion of deterrent power? I have two or three more points to bring together. Then I shall be glad to yield.

As I have stated, the first element is the power of strategic retaliation. The second is the power of mobility. This, to my mind, is vitally important. I am sorry the Senator from Ohio is not present in the Chamber, because I think this would help to answer one of the difficulties which he had in mind concerning the great Russian force.

The free world cannot hope to build a static defense line all around the iron curtain, but it can and must deploy powerful mobile forces at strategic bases so that, in the event of attack, they can go into action at the weakest points in the attacker's armor, wherever those points may be.

So we have the power of strategic retaliation and we have the power of mobility. We cannot possibly put a circle around the land mass of Russia plus the land mass of China, which are now together. I cannot conceive of a static army strong enough to meet an attack from any of those areas. We must have mobility. We must have the strategic points which the Senator from Minnesota has so well emphasized, in order to be able to retaliate promptly with our air and atomic weapons.

Finally—and this, I think, is very important—there is the power of ground defense in Europe. Western Europe is now the most vital area endangered by Communist aggression. By building the Western European army under General Eisenhower, we make it clear to the Russians that they cannot swallow this immense strategic prize without paying an ever-increasing price, not only in retaliation against their own homeland, but also in heavy losses on the ground. It has been suggested that there is no use in having any army in Europe, because we cannot possibly meet an over-all attack by Russia. Mr. President, I submit that we must have forces organized to defend those homelands that are so vital to the free world and to make the Russians pay a maximum price if they are going to take that risk.

I have been exploring the possibility of thinking in terms of a measuring stick for the European army, and I submit only this one tentative suggestion, namely, that the measuring stick might conceivably be a strong enough force to meet any possible attack by one satellite or a group of satellites; a force that could meet anything except the actual impact of the whole Russian strength. This would force the Russians themselves to join in the attack, in effect, to start world war III, and we would be prepared to retaliate immediately by striking at Russia's weakest points with all the force of our atomic bombs, our air and naval strength, and our mobile units.

The suggestion has been made that we could set up an army adequate to take care of a satellite or a group of satellites, which would not require the enormous army the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] has referred to in his remarks.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am prepared to yield to the Senator from Indiana if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. CAPEHART. I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey, as well as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], a question at this point. During the colloquy which took place between the two Senators mention was made of the fact that if Russia were to attack the United States we would want bases from which to attack Russia. My question is: Is the Senator confident that the European nations will fight Russia if Russia attacks the United States?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Of course, that is the whole spirit and purpose of the Atlantic Pact. The Atlantic Pact contemplates that an attack on one is an attack on all, and the third world war would then be on.

Mr. CAPEHART. Of course, the spirit of the United Nations is that they will likewise declare an aggressor to be an aggressor, and that they will join with the United States or any other members of the United Nations to fight an aggressor. England particularly has failed to do that with respect to Korea. They say they want no part of a war.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I said earlier that I agreed with the implication of the Senator's remarks, because the danger he speaks of is a real one in the light of the most unfortunate shilly-shallying in the United Nations. The intent of the UN Charter is to follow aggression with sanctions. In the case of the North Atlantic Pact, in my opinion, it is the duty of General Eisenhower to satisfy himself that in case of such an attack on the United States the other countries would stand fast and join us in defense against Russia.

Mr. CAPEHART. At the moment my opinion is that they would not.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am sympathetic with the Senator's feeling, but I do not think that we should choose the alternative of accepting that position and saying that therefore we will do nothing to assure the building up of collective security. I feel that it is necessary for us to stand together in a program of collective defense and see if we cannot work this problem out by the deterrent, united power of the North Atlantic nations, which should cause Russia to fear starting anything and make her realize that we are strong enough to meet attack, in other words, to show Russia that the cost of an attack is more than she can pay.

As I have said, I plan, in an address to be made next week, to deal with the Middle East, the Asian and the Japanese questions, and the present troubles in the UN, but at this moment I desire to pass to another aspect of this subject, because I feel it is vitally important to the whole picture. I shall move from the position of discussing defense, which is the Atlantic Pact problem, to a discussion of the problem of our offense in Europe. What should our offense be? We are not going to be aggressors, but, as I survey the situation, there is something going on in the world to which I am convinced we have not given sufficient attention.

I refer to the battle for the minds and spirits of men and women, otherwise known as the ideological struggle. In my considered judgment, having studied this matter ever since I have been in the Senate, and especially since the postwar period has come, the ideological struggle is the most important aspect of our foreign policy. Military strength and economic strength are important, but they are not enough. We might win in a third world war and still lose because we did not undertake wholeheartedly this important ideological struggle. We must face the issues in that struggle and the question whether or not Russia is defeating us in the battle for the minds and spirits of men.

I submit that if we are to win out in this struggle, it is not sufficient merely to be anti-Communist. Along with political, economic, and military programs the Communists have been smart enough to use the power of ideas in what may be called a four-dimensional offensive against us. The Communist ideology has been the central factor in the Russian attack. They have placed their ideology in the middle of the picture, and then built their military, political, and economic program around it.

Our defense, on the other hand, has tended to rely primarily on a three-dimensional strategy. That is, we have thought in terms of economic, political, and military programs, and have given too little attention to the power of ideas. We have given too little attention to what I call the spiritual and moral offensive to catch the imagination of the people of the world, and enable them to see that the issue is something very fundamental.

So I suggest that the free world must develop the superior force of an idea greater than communism, an idea more revolutionary than communism: The universal idea of human freedom. It seems to me that that is the thing which is being lost sight of in this whole contest.

There is a picture in the world, to which I shall refer again later, of America as a capitalistic, materialist, dollar-sign nation competing against Russian communism, with the Russians claiming that they are the champions of the downtrodden, and that they are trying to release the downtrodden classes from the domination of other powers. In trying to counteract this devastatingly erroneous interpretation, we have failed to put across the conception of freedom which is the foundation stone of all our American traditions. We must emphasize that the keynote of our traditions is not merely freedom as license, but freedom under the high spiritual power of Almighty God, and that we have built this country on a deeply spiritual foundation which has made possible our greatness. If once properly set forth and explained to the world, it can defeat the claims of communism, which are atheistic and materialistic, and which embody the Marxist philosophy of class hatred.

I think it is appropriate to refer to an illustration which I am taking from the Constitutional Convention of 1787——

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds to the Constitutional Convention, may I ask him a question on the subject of freedom?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Vermont, although I am going to continue on the subject of freedom.

Mr. FLANDERS. I have been wondering to what extent freedom, as an abstract question, is of primary interest to people who are living in a substandard manner of life, as we understand it. Are there not, in the case of the people behind the iron curtain, questions of freedom which apply more directly to their own situations? Is it not reasonable to believe that the freedom of their sons or their brothers or their fathers who have been taken away in the darkness of the night, perhaps, and sent to labor camps, they know not where, is of more immediate concern to them? Is there not a very lively personal sense of freedom viewed from that standpoint which perhaps would be stronger with these people than freedom as a more or less abstract subject?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Vermont has raised that point. As I recall, when he was speaking in the Senate a week or so ago, he stated that the "gemier" parts of his speech would come later. I may suggest to him that the points he has raised in the questions he has asked me will be developed later in my speech.

My point here is that we must interpret freedom in a way that the people with whom we deal can understand, for otherwise we shall not be understood. After all, when we discuss freedom when we are dealing with Americans we translate it into terms which apply to the lives of our own people. So we should proceed in similar fashion in attempting to have our interpretation of freedom understood by the people in the Far East, for example, by the people in the other parts of the world, where the people have never enjoyed the freedoms we take for granted, and where they may be suffering from hunger and poverty. I think we must consider and emphasize that.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, although I had agreed to be in attendance at a certain committee hearing to listen to a person of very high rank, I am inclined to remain here now, to wait for the gems of which the Senator from New Jersey speaks.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the distinguished Senator from Vermont will not be disappointed.

First, Mr. President, I wish to point out that in the early days of the history of the United States, our people floundered around with their conceptions of freedom. They were not entirely clear as to what freedom meant. Those who came to this land knew in a general way that they had come here in order to achieve certain freedoms. However, there was confusion regarding them at the time of the writing of the Constitution, in Philadelphia, in 1787; and our people were prone to be divided by bickering and jealousies which were reflected in the discussions at Philadelphia. Then arose one of our elder statesmen, Benjamin Franklin, who was over 80 years of age at the time, and he called attention to the fact that one trouble was that the people there thought they could rely upon their own wisdom and did not need to rely upon a Higher Wisdom.

I refer now to the spiritual guidance we need in connection with our attempts to deal with these complex world problems and to solve them. I think the words of Benjamin Franklin will be most helpful to us. He said then:

> I have lived, sir, a long time, and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth that God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid? I * * * believe that without His concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel. We shall be divided by our little partial local interests; our projects will be confounded; and we ourselves shall become a reproach and byword down to future ages. And, what is worse, mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing governments by human wisdom and leave it to chance, war, and conquest.

Mr. President, at this time I quote that statement merely because it seems to me that in connection with the present battle for the minds of men, it is most important to have all men realize, as we have learned during the course of our history, that man by himself cannot solve these problems.

Furthermore, Mr. President, if we continue to think of what we mean by human freedom, it seems to me we should redefine to the other nations of the world our moral position in concrete and positive terms, so as to stress the common aims and aspirations of the free world for freedom and peace with justice. Such a redefinition should take the form of a ringing and positive declaration of peace objectives. I suggest the following as examples of matters which should be included in a redefinition of peace objectives. These have been suggested by many other Members of this body, so they are not new, but all of these suggestions should be refined, clarified, and assembled in one declaration, which would include:

First, the broad outlines of a disarmament program. Let us keep stressing our desire for peace, Mr. President.

Second, consistent adherence to the principle of freedom of communication and freedom of information, not only as applied to ourselves, but also as applied to the peoples of other countries. In that connection, I refer to the resolution submitted today by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] in which I was happy to join, and which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] has endorsed. As evidence of our adherence to the principle of freedom of communication and information, we should send a message of friendship to the people of Russia, and we should insist that that friendship message be gotten through the iron curtain, in order to reach the Russian people.

Third—and this is very important, as I found as I traveled through the Far East last year—we must present to these people our unquestioned belief in the self-determination of peoples, through self-expression and self-development; and we must present to them our unquestioned opposition to any future imperialism, colonialism, or any attempt to impose by force a system of government upon a peaceful nation. We must be prepared to do all we can, just as we have done in Korea, and as we ought to be prepared to do in other parts of the world, to help people who aspire to achieve freedom.

Fourth, we should continue to demonstrate our willingness to achieve our objectives through the United Nations. Of course, I have been disappointed in the recent developments in the United Nations, but I believe that the United Nations organization still contains the promise of peace with justice; and while it is going through the ordeal of developing a new means of dealing with international problems, we must continue to demonstrate our willingness to work through the United Nations.

Fifth, we must affirm our rededication to democratic principles in our own countries. There must be a frank recognition that our systems of government are not perfect, but that we are seeking to give people freedom of self-expression and self-development. Certainly we must insist that the people of the free world must practice the democratic principles we profess and in that way give to the other nations examples of freedom in action.

Mr. President, in addition to the declaration of peace objectives I have outlined, we must lose no opportunity to strengthen our information programs, and to relate them to the traditions, the problems, and the attitudes of other peoples, so that they will have an impact upon the everyday life of the peoples concerned. This is a part of our foreign-policy program that has not been adequately emphasized.

We must translate our conception of freedom—and this is the approach to the problem about which the Senator from Vermont has asked—into words which have tangible meaning to peoples all over the world.

Mr. President, I have often suggested that we should not try to dominate this field by necessarily applying to our broadcasts the title "The Voice of America." I have suggested that we call it, the Voice of Freedom or the Voice of the Free World.

In order not to get into a position of appearing to dominate in that connection, we should encourage other countries to join us in stating what freedom means. There might well be a Voice of the Western European Nations, a Voice of the Benelux Countries, a Voice of Free China, or a Voice of Free Asia.

In any event, the important point is that in the dissemination of information from the free nations of the world to those that are groping for freedom, we must use words and terms which have tangible meaning to the peoples of countries all over the world; and we should state very definitely, in terms they will understand, just what freedom means to them.

In this connection, Mr. President, I should state that General Eisenhower, in his recent speech at the Library of Congress, before the joint meeting of the House and the Senate, emphasized the importance of our information program. He said:

> I will close on one note * * * (that) does not lie completely within my province, but it is important. * * * That is our own efforts to let the world understand what we are about, about what we are, and sometimes our own efforts to have our own people understand what we are trying to do. In any event, I believe that the United States needs a very, very much stronger information service. In our case I will not call it propaganda, because the truth is all we need. We don't have to falsify the record, nor our intentions.

Mr. President, I think we have relegated the entire program of information—our Voice of America program and all the aspects of the communication of ideas and information which is a central part of this cold war for the minds of men—to a relatively insignificant place in our entire military and diplomatic scheme of things. I am very sympathetic with the suggestion made recently by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] that we should take the information service, the Voice of America, entirely out of the State Department, and should set it up by itself, because of its importance, so that we can be sure that it constitutes one of the chief means upon which we rely in our continuous contact with the rest of the world and in our struggle against Communist infiltration.

Recently I was engaged in conversations with some of my colleagues, and the question arose, "Have not we lost our prestige in Europe, recently?" There was general agreement that whereas in years past we were respected and admired as one of the leading champions of freedom in the world, since then we have become unpopular for one reason or another. Those who participated in these group discussions attempted to explore the reasons for this situation. I shall not go into detail in that connection, except to say that it is always true that if one member of a group is more prosperous than the others, there is always an element of envy which results in making the prosperous person somewhat unpopular. I am afraid, however, that we have not used our prestige and our strength to the best effect. Rightly or wrongly, we have been looked upon as the "dollar country." We have been rather aggressively dominant in dealing with many of these people. We should face these facts, and should realize that we have to practice an attitude of humility in dealing with other people of the world, who are very proud, and who resent any attempt on our part to be the dominant factor in discussions or in working out these programs.

That is why I said earlier that, even though I feel that General Eisenhower is the most capable military man to deal with the present situation in Europe, he is wise when he says he does not think he should be in the position of dominating the decisions, but should rather share in determining the decisions of those who have the problems to meet.

So we cannot overlook the importance of humility. We have to face the problems of the world as one of many nations, not permitting to operate against us the feeling which apparently has started in some areas of the world. I shall deal with that subject more fully next week, because my experience in the Far East has brought it forcefully to my attention. The people of the Far East understand us less than do our European cousins, and they feel that we are a people far removed from them, with completely different ideologies from their own.

There are obvious examples of our own derelictions, which I feel we must correct. I am calling attention to them to indicate that we cannot merely pride ourselves as having attained a position of eminence in this matter. We cannot solve these problems without recognizing the difficulties in our own country, which indicate that we have fallen down within our own borders. For example, the Kefauver subcommittee has been doing excellent work in bringing out many evidences of crime in America. The situation depicted is very distressing, and it is something to which we should certainly be giving a great deal of attention, in an effort to determine why such things can happen.

I was very much disturbed by the draft rejections which we experienced during World War II, and have been concerned about the rejections in the recent draft, which indicate that a large percentage of young people are suffering from mental illnesses. They are disturbed because they do not know quite where they are going. They are drifting. They need leadership.

I am distressed by the evidences of family distintegrations in this country. I am distressed by the evidences of discrimination, of one kind and another, among our people. We do not adequately face up to these moral issues which mean so much to the future of any nation, and which meant so much to us when this great country was originally founded.

It is my conviction, as I stated earlier, that we must return to the principles of our basic Christian tradition, on which were laid the moral and spiritual foundations of this great Republic. In times past, when we drifted away from these principles, we felt the evil effects of our derelictions.

I need only refer to the crisis during the war between the States, which arose when Lincoln was suffering his greatest difficulties. One statement he made at that time, which is not quoted so frequently as are some of the other things he said, seems to me to be particularly applicable today in considering the problems we are facing. Lincoln said:

> We have been recipients of the choicest bounties of heaven; we have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity; we have grown in number, wealth, and power as no other nation has ever grown. But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved us in peace and multiplied and enriched and strengthened us, and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God who made us.

I merely quote that and place it in the RECORD because it seems to me that there we have the thinking of one of the greatest leaders of all time, a man who certainly understood his people, who certainly loved them and was not overly critical of them. He was merely saying that we became "intoxicated with success" without recognizing that the force behind what happened was a power outside ourselves.

But, in addition to what I have said about humility, and about the necessity of examining our own record before we try to preach too much to others, I desire to submit a word of caution. The fact that we need humility does not mean that we do not have great responsibility for leadership. I wish to distinguish between leadership in the right sense and an attitude of domination, which I fear, and against which General Eisenhower warned us. The great province of leadership is to inspire others by example. That is what I have been hoping I could bring out in the course of my remarks—that the course America follows will be the means by which we can sell our idea of freedom to other countries.

We have an example today in the food problem of India. I have been very eager to relieve the Indian people who may soon be suffering from famine, and I hope helpful legislation will be enacted. I trust the assistance may be extended without relation to any possible political implications, without reference to the fact that we may not agree with India's position today. The questions of suffering, of famine, of human beings being in danger of losing their lives, are entirely apart from any differences between us as nations. America has always met such a challenge, and I trust and hope and pray that she will meet this challenge.

The great province of leadership is to inspire others by example, to persuade them to do what needs to be done in their own interest. General Eisenhower referred in his speech to a rising spiral of strength and morale, and we must have that rising spiral. This does not mean paternalism. It does not mean a constant goading. We want to get away from any feeling of resentment which may come from any of our activities. We must try to dispel any feeling on the part of other nations that we look upon them as inferiors. As the strongest free nation, we must exert true leadership of the kind to which I have referred, and the leadership which through its actions, speaks louder than words, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] has said. We profess to believe in humility, but if our actions do not coincide with our professions, it is of no avail. These problems are matters involving character—our national character and individual character.

In concluding these remarks, Mr. President, I desire to call attention especially to what seems to me to be a very significant aspect of the present world crisis. Russia, by very clever propaganda, has painted a picture of what is going on in the world which to my mind is absolutely misleading. Yet it has pervaded the minds and hearts of many peoples of many nations. Russian propaganda presents the struggle as a fight between the two major powers, the United States and Russia, with the United States representing imperialism, colonialism, and a decadent capitalism that exploits the common man, while Russian communism is the virtuous and benevolent champion of the poor and downtrodden.

There is no doubt that in large areas of the world this erroneous contrast has been dramatized until today there are nations wondering whether for their own best interests they should get into the tent behind the iron curtain with Russia, or whether they should get behind the western countries, and especially the United States. Millions of people are confused as to the real issue, and as to the true aspirations and objectives of the United States and the Western World.

This is evidenced by the strong sentiment for neutrality. I encountered when I was in Europe the question whether some of the countries should remain neutral, the suggestion that the struggle need not affect all nations and all peoples and the idea of waiting to see. It has shocked me beyond measure, because it seems to me that if the free world has not been able to show that what is at stake is something far more than simply a contest for power between two great nations, it has missed its greatest opportunity. The future of the civilized world is definitely at stake. Our most important challenge, then, is to convince the peoples of the world that this is a struggle between human freedom under God and slavery to a totalitarian state.

This means that we must acquaint people everywhere with our belief in the sacredness of the individual man, of his right to self-expression, to self-development, and to protection against exploitation by any stronger power. That is what we mean by freedom. It also means informing people everywhere of the true nature of the Russian Communist system, with its complete denial of the value of the individual, and its complete exploitation of the individual by the state. The contrast is evident, but, as I see it, we have failed to make it clear. The fundamental issue is between real freedom, freedom under God, as we have experienced it in this world, and human slavery.

Lincoln quoting Scripture, it will be recalled, said that a house divided against itself cannot stand, and so a nation half slave and half free cannot endure. I think we are facing the issue of a world divided against itself unless this great problem is solved. Nothing less than our dedication to a new birth of freedom of the world is adequate to meet the crisis. As Lincoln Day approaches I believe we cannot too often restate his great vision of what this eternal struggle is about. I need only to quote the closing words of his Gettysburg address:

> That this Nation, under God—

We can change the words, now, to "This world, under God"— > may have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

The America of our forefathers is the hope of the world today. It is my hope and prayer that America shall not fail the world.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I wanted to address myself to the subject the Senator was discussing, as I indicated, but I waited until the conclusion of the Senator's very worthwhile address, which I wish might be esteemed the "Voice of America" to be heard by our friends around the world. If they would listen to it and follow its teachings, our problem would be much less difficult.

Mr. President, I wish to invite the Senator's attention briefly to a portion of geography which it seems to me has been very much ignored. I refer to the Mediterranean. It was not mentioned by General Eisenhower in his discussion, but it is my understanding that in his statement before the committees he did recognize its strategic importance, as well as that of the nations which border the Mediterranean. It has been the center of civilization in the past, and is a place in which wars in the very recent past have been waged.

Turkey, in proportion to its resources, has been the greatest contributor to the battling in Korea. I think that would be a fair statement, would it not?

am glad to join with him in paying tribute to the wonderful aid which the Turkish forces have been contributing in the war in Korea. They realized their own danger in connection with the Dardanelles and the Bosporus, and they knew that they might be the next victim. They realized what Korea meant in the whole picture of the world struggle.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is profoundly correct. Would the Senator from New Jersey, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which we must look for guidance, think that European countries would be recognized in connection with any appeasement program, so far as the Bosporus may be concerned?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. So far as I am concerned, I can see nothing in appeasement. I should be opposed to any such appeasement program as the Senator suggests.

Mr. BREWSTER. Especially with reference to a nation which is standing so resolutely by our side at this time?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. There are the usual rumblings of diplomatic intrigue in the discussions proceeding among the four great powers.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think the Senator will agree with me that that was one of the things that was so disastrous in the conferences in which some of us felt that China was betrayed.

Mr. BREWSTER. So much for one end of the Mediterranean. I shall now invite the attention of the Senator to the other end of the Mediterranean, Gibraltar, and to its strategic importance in connection with the world-wide picture which has always prevailed. I wish to refer to the amendment which was adopted under the sponsorship of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON]. It has been a matter of concern to many Senators, and it was the subject of an overwhelming vote of both House and Senate when the amendment was offered. Is the Senator aware of the fact that under the provision which was adopted 6 months ago, not one dollar of assistance—and I quote the exact language—"has been extended to Spain"?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am not aware of that.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is the fact. I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the language of the Senator from Wyoming in discussing the amendment, indicating what he had in mind, and what I am sure was the intent of both the Senate and the House in their vote. I am referring to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 9, page 11465, the Senator from Wyoming speaking:

> That is precisely what the Senator from Nevada wishes to do—provide export-import credit aid to Spain. It can be done, it seems to me, more successfully by adopting the technique in the bill which was passed last year rather than by cutting anything out of the appropriation for the rest of Western Europe.

The Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] asked him how this would affect or change the situation, and the Senator from Wyoming replied:

> Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will show the Senator precisely how it changes it. I think that as a matter of realism we have to come to the conclusion now we should no longer be dependent upon vague promises which are not fulfilled and her is a directive of the Congress to perform an act the failure to perform which in the past has been defended on the ground, "Well, we have the legal power and we need no more." Yes, the Export-Import Bank had the power, but for reasons which are difficult to explain on any theory that does not conflict with our announced policy to contain communism the loans have not been made.

The Senator from Wyoming went on to say:

> I think that with respect to the policy toward Spain, if the State Department has opposed Export-Import Bank loans, this is precisely the place to reverse it, because if the Spanish peninsula is not held in the affairs which are now rapidly developing in Western Europe, much if not all of our economic aid to ECA countries will have been lost. If the arguments which are being made today at Lake Success, in the Security Council, under the Presidency of the representative of the Soviet Union and on behalf of the Kremlin policy—if those arguments and those tactics should prevail, it seems to me that there could be no possible question that refusal to deal realistically in Spain will only help to handicap our program. We should match realism with realism, and meet the issue as it is.

The Senator from Wyoming went on as follows:

> The Senator from New York has already answered himself, when a moment ago he rose and interrupted me to ask me a question. His question was: Does not the Export-Import Bank now have the authority to do this? The inference from the Senator's question was, of course, "We are ready to lend this money now. The Export-Import Bank can do it." But the sad fact is that the authority of the Export-Import Bank is not being used and we were told this afternoon the State Department is responsible.

Is the Senator from New Jersey surprised and concerned to find that six months' time has elapsed since that overwhelming vote, and that not one dollar has been advanced, so far as Spain is concerned?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I was not aware of that development.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator consider that there is any doubt that Spain has adequately presented its case before the Export-Import Bank in order to get the relief which Congress apparently considered was essential?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am not aware of what protestations Spain made.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator has referred to the need in India. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the need in Spain is equally great? Is he aware that in Yugoslavia, to which we gave aid some time ago, the wheat crop was 80 percent of the normal crop, and that the wheat crop in Spain for the past 5 years has been 65 percent of the pre-war normal. Would it not seem, under the mandate of Congress and because of human need, that the Export-Import Bank and other agencies of Government might well give consideration to the question either on the ground of expediency, on which the Yugoslav proposal was presented by the Senator from Arkansas, or on the ground of human need, which the Senator from New Jersey so eloquently and properly feels is present in the case of India?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I was under the impression when we passed the legislation that it would go through the regular routine, and relief would be given. I am glad the Senator has brought up the subject.

Mr. BREWSTER. I trust that the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in their vision, which extends around Europe and through the Orient, will give consideration to conditions in the Mediterranean, in the interest of carrying out the plain mandate adopted by Congress six months ago.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield for a question.

Mr. MCMAHON. I should like to say to the Senator from New Jersey that I was not able to listen to his entire address. Unfortunately I had an engagement outside the Chamber and was therefore unable to hear all of it. I did hear the last portion of his address. The Senator knows how thoroughly I agree with him in the thesis which he has expounded, to the effect that the greatest strength that America can bring to the struggle is moral strength. I wish to thank the Senator for what he has said concerning the resolution which was submitted today. He was generous in joining with me and the other Senators in its proposals. I hope that we can now go forward and at least give positive evidence that the Congress of the United States, contrary to the propaganda pouring out of Moscow every day to the effect that we intend and desire the imperialistic enslavement of humanity everywhere, is determined that the world and its people shall be free. I think the Senator has delivered a statesmanlike address and exposition of the truth of our real intentions.

I may say to the Senator that I have taken an excerpt from the news ticker in the cloakroom, dealing with the Kremlin's attitude on our position. It seems to me that the pitch of their campaign is rising in its intensity. I view such development with a good deal of apprehension. It smacks too much on the same kind of techniques which Hitler and Goebbels used as they prepared for their aggressions. I do not know whether it has escaped the attention of Senators. If so, I recommend that they investigate the rising intensity of the bitterness of the releases which are coming out of Moscow, in which we are being accused of plotting all kinds of foul deeds in the world. I assure the Senator it is a study which is well worth while.

I close my remarks by saying to the Senator from New Jersey that I congratulate him on his excellent address.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARIES

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator for his kind remarks. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE WAR IN KOREA AND THE GEOGRAPHY OF AMERICA'S FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, before I take up my prepared address I wish to comment very briefly on the colloquy between the able Senator from New Jersey and the equally able Senator from Minnesota a short time ago, in which they referred to the huge volume of mail which has come to them from their constituents. Every Member of the Senate, and every Member of Congress, has been astounded by the huge volume of mail which has come to him. Thousands and thousands of letters have come to our offices from the folks back home whom we have the honor to represent. Our offices and our staff have been figuratively, if not literally, buried under the avalanche of communications. I believe there has been nothing like it in legislative history, at least not to my knowledge. The communications are not the ordinary run of the mill letters with reference to pending legislation, such as, "Please vote for this," or "Please vote against that." They reflect a degree of bewilderment and confusion which, as I have said, is without counterpart in legislative history. All through them, like a thread through a string of beads, runs one word: "Why?"

They say:

Our boys are fighting in Korea. Why?

There is no declared war. Yet we have upward of 50,000 casualties in Korea. Why?

We are told that the major portion of the so-called United Nations Army in Korea is composed of American troops. Why?

We are told that our intelligence was faulty. We are told that there was some failure, possibly, to evaluate such intelligence as was available. Why?

We are told that there is a possibility, at least, that we will be called upon to send our boys to Formosa, Indochina, the Philippines, and Japan. Why?

We are told that it is necessary to build up an army for the defense of Western Europe. Why?

We are told that it is essential to build up an army of perhaps 3½ million or 4 million men within the coming few months. Why?

We are told it is necessary to impose universal military training on the Nation. Why?

We are told it is necessary to lower the draft age to 18 years. Why?

We are told that the military program may take 10 years. Why?

We are told that it is necessary to have absolute economic control and rationing. Why?

We are told that we are going to have to increase the tax load on our people to an almost unbelievable weight. Why?

Why? Why? Why?

Mr. President, our people are entitled to know. It is because such questions have not been answered that there have resulted confusion, misunderstanding, and some measure of hostility. I have been somewhat critical of the leadership of the Nation, because I felt that it was lax, within the limits imposed by the security needs of the country, not to make the policies and the reason for the thinking behind the policies available to the American people.

Mr. President, ours is a democracy. The people of the United States, under our form of government, are not limited by the famous lines of Tennyson:

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

Mr. President, I have received and answered since Christmas more than 6,000 letters of the character to which I have referred. I said that I have criticized the leadership, because it has not made available to our people such information as could be made available to them. The people of my State, as of every other State, are ready to contribute their boys, and they are ready to assume any burden of sacrifice or responsibility if they have an idea of what it is for and what the goals are.

Mr. President, in attempting to answer the letters, I have found it impossible to cover the ground within the confines and limits of a dictated reply. In preparing for delivery in the Senate a speech which might be in a measure a foundation stone for future discussions, I felt that I was lax, because it was so difficult, and the ramifications were so complex, that it was almost impossible for me, within the limits of an address to be delivered on the floor of the Senate, to give any clear explanation.

I am also tremendously concerned because my friends who write to me from Iowa say, "Senator, we have sent you to Washington as our representative. We cannot be on the ground to know what is going on. Will you please give us a simple, clear, concise answer as to what the objectives of our Nation are in the policies which we are undertaking and carrying out?"

The inability to do that is something which has kept me awake at night. We are undertaking here what we call the great debate. Unfortunately, too often that debate has been concerned either with military strategy—whether we think it is militarily possible to defend this area or that area—or with a discussion of general principles.

I was pleased when the able leader of the majority [Mr. MCFARLAND] interrogated the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] when the latter was making his very eloquent speech this afternoon. He asked the Senator from Ohio, "Is the Senator stating his own conclusions, or opinions which he has received from the generals?" It occurred to me that there were two generals to whom we ought to listen, that is, General Principles and General Experience. The sooner we do that, the better it will be for the Nation and for the world.

I was also much interested a few moments ago when the eloquent Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] spoke of the fact that we should engage not only in defense but in offense. He defined the offense to which he alluded as the offense to bring to bear on all the world the basic principles of brotherhood, and spiritual and heart development.

In an attempt to correct in a small measure my own laxity, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to deliver a prepared address, which, unfortunately, is somewhat abstruse, but I believe that it ought to be in the RECORD as a cornerstone to the discussion which will be carried on later this week, and will certainly be carried on after the appropriate committees have considered such resolutions as the pending Wherry resolution.

Mr. President, it is becoming a commonplace to say that the United States is confronted with a permanent world crisis. It is a crisis unlike any we have known before, and we have been slow to learn how to live with it. One of the first things to learn, as the record of the past 7 months seems to show, is that no foreign policy and no grand strategy which the Government's experts and specialists may devise to meet this sort of crisis can hope to succeed without the full understanding and the fundamental agreement of the vast majority of the American people. It therefore becomes the business of all our people, and of all their representatives, to join in every major step of the long-range planning for foreign policy. If the people and their representatives do not make this their business, if they leave it to the experts to do the job, if they do not therefore understand and agree at least with the broad outlines and the ultimate purpose of our country's foreign policy, the whole structure may collapse or be torn apart from within at the moment of greatest danger.

Today, Mr. President, I am inviting my fellow Senators to join me in a voyage of discovery, or a tour of inspection, to explore the geography of our foreign policy, in the hope that we may return from the trip with a clearer picture of the broad outlines and the ultimate purpose of that policy than some of us may now possess.

THE THREE ESSENTIALS

The foreign policy of the United States is a constant process of seeking to create and maintain an effective balance among three basic elements: First, America's vital interests in the world; second, the commitments made to protect or advance these vital interests; and, third, the power America must have to fulfill these commitments.

I would judge that a country has a solvent foreign policy if it has assumed commitments great enough and broad enough to protect its vital interests but not too great and not too broad to fulfill with the power at its disposal. A country that has made commitments beyond its capacity to fulfill will one day be obliged either to reduce its commitments or to increase its power, if it can, or incur national bankruptcy and defeat.

Whenever in our history we have failed to achieve or maintain an effective balance among these three essentials, we have paid dearly in lives and in treasure for that failure. From 1900 onward, for example, the United States was committed to the defense of the Philippines; yet for 40 years few Americans, except the experts, believed that the Philippine Islands were an area of vital interest to our country. Then in 1941, we learned the tragic facts: we did not have the power to fulfill the commitments made 40 years before to defend those islands. It took us nearly four terrible years of war to liberate them from the Japanese conqueror.

In the present day, failure to balance the essential factors of our foreign policy might not mean merely the temporary loss of distant island outposts, but the destruction of our Republic itself. If the Senate is to have a debate on foreign policy, it is to these great questions that we should first address ourselves, long before considering the ways and means of implementing the policy or passing judgment on the conduct of one or another of its subordinate aspects.

First, it seems to me, we must seek to define the interests of the United States in the world, reach an agreement among ourselves and our people as to what they are, distinguished accurately among vital and secondary interests, and determine in what order of importance we should rank them. Until this is done, we will continue to walk in the fog of doubt and confusion.

Second, we must survey the major commitments which the United States has made for the protection of its vital interests, in order to ascertain whether we have made adequate commitments, whether we are overcommitted in terms of what our interests require, and whether we may have committed ourselves to protect areas of interest which are not really vital but instead only secondary or apparent.

Third, we must estimate as closely as we can, with the advice and counsel of military and other experts, how great a power we must develop, and of what kind, in order to fulfill the major commitments covering our vital interests.

Then, based on our estimate of what is required, we must assess the power, the resources, and the capacity presently or potentially available, to determine whether we have enough to carry out the commitments made, whether we have a deficit in necessary power, or whether we have a surplus of power and potential, either to hold in reserve or to exercise in the fulfillment of new obligations we may be compelled to make to meet new threats to our vital interests.

If we do these things, Mr. President, I feel confident that we can approach an effective balance among our interests, our commitments, and our power, and I also feel confident that the American people, understanding this, will give our Government unhesitating support in the great tasks ahead.

Wherever our formal commitments and our vital interests in the world do not coincide, or at least do not seem to, there we find the source of the most embittered disagreements within the Congress and among our people. This is most obviously the case with regard to the Far East, especially in Korea, China, Formosa, and Indochina. It is less obviously the case with regard to Western Germany, Central Europe, and the Mediterranean, especially Spain and Yugoslavia.

If we are ever to reach a decision on our Far East policy which our people can wholeheartedly support, we must first agree on whether or not Korea, China, Formosa, and Indochina lie within an area of vital interest to the United States. We must agree on the nature, the extent, and the relative importance of that interest. We must agree on the character of the commitment we will make to protect that vital interest, if we decide such an interest exists.

Until we do this, Mr. President, all the speeches and propaganda and emotional appeals and hysterical accusations by which we are being assailed from all sides will serve merely to deepen and widen the chasm of confusion into which we have been plunging. We shall continue to be torn between the Europe firsters, the Asia firsters, the Formosa firsters, the America firsters, the globalists, and the retreatists, and all the other 999 varieties of parlor strategists and back-door statesmen.

OUR UNITED NATIONS COMMITMENT

First of all, however, I should like to preface a survey of our interests, commitments, and power with a brief discussion of our commitment under the United Nations Charter.

It will be valuable to draw a distinction between two kinds of commitments. One is the kind we make for the purpose of protecting an area of vital interest to the United States, in which we say, in effect, that the protection of that area is so essential to the defense of our own country that we will go to war, if necessary, to protect it. This is a commitment through vital interest.

The second type of commitment obligates us to abide by the principles of an international organization of states. We have made this kind of commitment under the United Nations Charter, which we participated in formulating. We are committed to abide by the principles of the Charter and by the decisions of the constituted agencies of the United Nations, which we also participate in formulating. This is a legal commitment covering our relations with a world organization.

Viewed negatively, the difference between these two types of commitment is that, whereas we might withdraw from our commitment to the United Nations without necessarily imperiling any of the areas of vital interest to us, we cannot withdraw from commitments we make for the protection of areas of vital interest without sooner or later imperiling our very national security. I do not wish to be interpreted as advocating withdrawal from the United Nations; I am merely illustrating the distinction between two kinds of obligations.

A farmer who owns property in a region plagued by prairie fires has a vital interest in protecting his property; he commits himself to insurance policies, buys fire-fighting equipment, and joins his neighbors in a volunteer fire department for their common protection. The farmer also assumes another commitment of a different sort as a citizen; he obeys the laws of his government, pays taxes, and, to the degree he can or will, participates in governing his country. He can withdraw from this latter commitment by changing his nationality and leaving the country. He cannot withdraw from his commitment to defend his vital property interest against prairie fires without risking the loss of both his property and his life.

This analogy leads us directly to the issue in Korea.

When the North Korean armies breached the peace and invaded South Korea, the members of the United Nations were obligated by their legal commitments to that organization to do certain things. The United States took the lead in proposing ways to fulfill these commitments. On June 25 and June 27, 1950, our delegation proposed resolutions which, the Soviet Union being absent, the Security Council adopted with alacrity. Among other things, the Council recommended that members furnish such assistance as might be necessary to repel the armed attack and restore peace.

Thereafter, and throughout the Korean War, the United States and the other countries which have sent men and matériel to Korea under the United Nations banner have been acting on the principle that they are fulfilling a legal obligation or commitment under the United Nations Charter. Yet, from the beginning, it has been the United States that has taken the lead. Why? Was it simply because we are the strongest and richest member? Was it merely because we had troops in Japan close to the scene? Was it because we believed more firmly in the principles of the Charter than anyone else, or that we believed our commitment under the Charter was greater and more binding than that of other countries, and that, hence, we had to do more to fulfill it? There is no doubt that these considerations played an important role.

But is it not strange that so little mention has been made of another consideration? Is it not likely that reasons of vital American interest may also have been a potent factor in inducing the United States to take the lead and to invest nine times more troops and matériel in fighting the Korean war than all the other countries together? Is it not likely that the United States Government, after a period of protracted indecision, finally decided, when the chips were down, that Korea was an area of vital interest to this country and had to be protected, if humanly possible, against conquest by the advance guard of an expanding military empire aiming at the islands of Japan—another vital American interest?

Were not our legal commitments under the Charter, therefore, paralleled and reinforced by the decision that we did have a vital interest in Korea and by the realization that our membership in the United Nations not only obliged us to fulfill a legal commitment but also permitted us, belatedly, to act in defense of our vital interest?

In so reasoning, Mr. President, I do not wish to be regarded as a mind-reader who knows what went on in the high councils of our Government at that time. Events, nevertheless, have a way of speaking for themselves. Standing in a strategic position between Japanese, Chinese, and Soviet territories, the Korean peninsula has long been an area of vital interest to these three governments. As we know, Japan controlled it in this country until 1945.

In that year Korea also became an area of vital interest to the United States. American troops occupied South Korea up to the thirty-eighth parallel. We assumed a commitment to defend those troops, and, by inference, the territory which they occupied. We also occupied nearby Japan.

Many top American military commanders are said to have believed all along that Korea was indefensible against a determined assault from the mainland. Thus, after 1945, although we had a vital interest and a commitment to defend South Korea, we did not have, or believed we did not have, the power to back it up. Our Korean policy was not in balance.

Then, in 1949 after long negotiations we withdrew our troops from Korea. We made no formal commitment to the new Republic of Korea to go to its defense, but limited ourselves to sending economic and military assistance. In these circumstances, we still had a vital interest in Korea, because of Japan, but we had neither a commitment nor the power to fulfill one.

In June 1950 the Soviet Union sent its North Korean puppets to occupy all Korea. The attempt failed. In November Communist China in its turn set out to take over all Korea. The United Nations, America in the lead, has been trying to prevent both the Soviet Union and China from accomplishing their objectives. I should think that this brief recital of events demonstrates that the United States has a vital interest in Korea but has had an indecisive and wholly unbalanced policy for dealing with it.

Finally, Mr. President, would not the innumerable expressions of dissatisfaction, anger, and scorn that we have heard among our people over the failure of other members to respond with proportionate vigor and sacrifice have been somewhat less vociferous if the people had been told, and had believed, that we went into Korea not only for a principle, not only to fulfill an obligation, not only to counter an act of aggression, but also to defend our country in an area of vital interest to our long-range national security?

In June the course we took was almost universally acclaimed as the only honorable and possible one to follow. In January it has become fashionable to denounce and decry that course because it has not led to success. Yet, I ask my fellow Senators, would it not have been wiser and more responsible to have decided long before June 1950, through debate and agreement in the Congress, that the Korean peninsula was an area of vital interest to the United States, or that it was not, and that we were committed to its protection with sufficient power, or that we were not? Must we not now reach that sort of decision with regard not only to Korea but also to Formosa, China itself, Indochina, Japan, and perhaps other countries in the Far East? If we decide these areas are vital to our national security, and if this decision reflects the opinion of our people, must not we then commit ourselves to the protection of our interests there? Or, if we decide they are not vital, must we not prepare a wholly different series of measures for the defense of our Pacific frontier?

Furthermore, I believe that the American people would understand better why other countries have not poured men and materials into Korea proportionate to what we have sent if they realized that, while Korea may be an area of vital interest for America, it may well not be for many other countries. Let us ask why other countries hold back and do not follow our lead against Communist China. Could it be that for many of them China is not an area of vital national interest at all, and that for others their interest in China is altogether different than ours? Had this series of aggressions occurred somewhere else, might not a quite different alinement of forces have arisen to meet it, under quite other leadership?

All I am saying, Mr. President, is that, United Nations or no United Nations, sovereign states have their own paramount interests, and must, if they are to survive, commit themselves in their own way to protect those interests as best they can. We may not approve the way they choose or believe it has the slighest chance to succeed, but we will not be able to alter their course so long as China is not regarded by them as an area of paramount interest or is regarded as an interest quite different for them than it is for us. The task of our diplomacy, it seems to me, is to persuade the other non-Communist members of the United Nations that we and they have one supreme interest in common to us all. But I doubt that we can define that one supreme common interest until the United States has made up its own mind as to what and where its own vital interests are.

Without making any pretense of professional expertness in these matters, and with the hope and expectation that my colleagues will fill the gaps with their own valuable contributions, I should like now to make a rough sketch of what I believe to be the most important among our country's vital interests and the commitments that have been made, or not made, to cover these interests; and, finally, with even less pretense to expert knowledge, I would raise the question of the power and resources we have and those that we need in order to fulfill these commitments.

AMERICA'S VITAL INTERESTS

We have listened to a number of definitions of the purpose of American foreign policy. Some have been specific, some general, some broad, and some narrow. All, however, seem agreed that its purpose is primarily to defend something. I know of no one who defines its purpose as the conquest of the world or the establishment of an empire or any other aggressive aim, except—as referred to by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]—the type of offensive to which he referred as "the spiritual offensive." If there exists here in America a school of thought which holds that the purpose of our foreign policy should be conquest, imperialism, expansion, or aggression, it is a secret school of thought without publicly avowed exponents either in Congress or in the public at large.

Some say the purpose of American foreign policy is to defend peace, to prevent war, and, if these fail, to be able to fight and win a war. Others say its purpose is, first, to defend liberty, and, second to defend peace, but not peace at the price of liberty. Others have said that it is to defend our way of life and our institutions from conquest by the armies and agents of totalitarian dictatorship. Others again hold that its purpose is to contain communism or to deter aggression. Still others define it as the defense of democracy, or of free society, or of capitalism, or of Christian civilization, or of western culture, or of some other ideal or set of principles.

This sort of verbal definition, of course, is susceptible of infinite variation, with every man exercising his inalienable right to interpret the words in his own way, and to read into the words peace, liberty, way of life, civilization, and so forth, as much, or as little meaning, or as different meanings as he can or will. I wonder, Mr. President, whether we are not likely to lose ourselves completely in a forest of words and slogans if we continue to seek to define in purely verbal terms the purpose and objectives of American foreign policy.

Perhaps it will make for greater clarity and mutual understanding if we define the purposes of our foreign policy more in physical than in metaphysical terms. By physical terms, I mean chiefly geographic terms.

If we can establish with some degree of certainly the geographic areas which are of vital interest to the United States—that is, the areas which we must defend if the United States is to survive—we may reach a clearer conception of what our foreign policy is and what it must be. I realize that this effort will call for a longer view than our daily tasks usually permit us to take, but few will deny that the short view we have consistently taken these last years has led us to the brink of bottomless disaster.

What the American people need more than anything else in the present confusion is a picture of where they stand in the world. I have been hoping that the President of the United States would draw such a picture; and I believe it would be of incalculable value if he were to undertake a series of intimate radio talks with the people, in which he would draw the lines of this picture for all of us to see. While waiting for him to do so, it may be worth while to attempt to sketch some of the broad outlines of the picture, as they appear to one Senator.

What, and where, are America's vital interests? Remembering that its vital interests are those which are so essential to its own national security that it must protect them, by war if necessary, it goes without saying that the Nation's paramount interest is the defense of its own territorial integrity, its own physical security, and its own political independence.

The primary purpose of American foreign policy, therefore, must be to protect that paramount interest—in other words, to protect the territory which we inhabit and the Government under which we live. All the other countless interests of the United States would obviously be indefensible if we should fail in the defense of our own territory and independence. Of course, I include within this territory all the continental United States, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Panama Canal, and our other outlying possessions.

Beyond the borders of American territory, however, there lie areas of almost equal importance for the defense of our country. They are as follows:

First. The first area of vital interest to the United States is the North American Continent as a whole. This has been a fact for almost as long as we have been a nation. The defense of the territory, security, and independence of the North American Continent, and of the countries within it, is indisputably essential to the security and independence of the United States.

Second. The second area of vital interest to us is the Western Hemisphere and the countries within it. This has been recognized ever since the Monroe Doctrine was proclaimed. For the United States to remain secure and independent, the territorial integrity and security of the Western Hemisphere and the political independence of the countries within it are basic requirements, and have been for a century or more.

Third. The third vital interest of the United States is the protection of the sea and air approaches to the Western Hemisphere, particularly North America, across the Arctic, Atlantic, and Pacific Oceans. With every new technological advance in communications and transportation, the extent of this area has widened until it now includes all the islands lying on the sea and air approaches to our hemisphere, embracing even those close to the far shores of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, especially the British Isles to the east and the Japanese and Philippine Islands to the west, as well as Greenland and the islands to the north of Canada.

Regarding these three immense areas spreading outward from the United States, I doubt that there is any fundamental disagreement among our people. Whatever their attitudes may be toward the peoples or the governments of countries located in these three vast regions, most of the American people would agree, I believe, that the defense of these areas is essential to the protection of the United States itself. But if there is fundamental disagreement among us regarding these areas or any segment of them, we should know about it immediately and should settle the question among ourselves once and for all.

It is when we begin to consider the next two areas of greatest importance to us, however, that deep divisions appear and crack the surface of our Nation's unity. Let me, nevertheless, present them in the same form as that in which I have presented the areas of North America, the Western Hemisphere, and the sea and air approaches across the oceans that surround us.

Fourth. The fourth vital interest of the United States lies in the area comprising the countries of Western Europe and North Africa which border on the far shores of the Atlantic Ocean, an area which, if dominated by a conquering military power bent on our destruction, could become an enormous base for launching attacks on our sea and air approaches and for mounting an invasion of areas even more essential to our national security.

Two terrible wars in this century have demonstrated that the United States considers its national security endangered whenever the Atlantic coasts of Western Europe are conquered by a hostile, aggressive military power dominating that continent. When this happens, we prepare for the worst.

If the Nazi power, which in 1940 extended eastward only to the heart of Poland, made us leap to rearm ourselves the moment the western Allied barrier was breached, to what would we be driven today if the Communist power, stretching eastward across all Europe and Asia to the Sea of Japan, should stand at the Channel ports, on the coasts of Norway, and in Morocco?

By virtue of the fact that in the past 34 years the United States has twice gone to war to prevent the permanent conquest of Western Europe by a German military empire, by virtue of the action of Congress in establishing and appropriating funds for the European recovery program, and by virtue of the action of the Senate in ratifying the North Atlantic Treaty, I believe it is beyond question that a heavy majority of the people and the Congress of the United States have for a long time been convinced that the countries along the Atlantic coast of Europe form an area of vital interest to the security of the United States. This conviction is by no means unanimous, but the actions taken by the Congress and by the Government in the face of a threat to Western Europe bespeak a preponderant opinion among our people that that area is vital to American security. How deeply into Europe and into the Mediterranean that interest extends, and how far down the coast of Africa, has yet to be decided and agreed on. Does it reach to the frontiers of the Russian orbit in central and southeastern Europe? Do Greece, Turkey, and North Africa lie within it? These are things we must decide. Only this afternoon, the able Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] interrogated the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] along the line of that question.

Fifth. The fifth vital interest of the United States lies in the area comprising the countries of eastern Asia which border on the far shores of the Pacific Ocean, from which an assault by a hostile conquering military power controlling those countries could be launched on the sea approaches and territory of North America.

By virtue of a great number of American actions in the far Pacific, including our long occupation of the Philippine Islands; the enunciation of the open-door policy for China; the intervention of President Theodore Roosevelt in the settlement of the Russo-Japanese War; the American mission in Siberia during Russia's post-revolutionary civil war; the long, if futile, efforts from 1931 to 1941 to prevent by peaceful means the Japanese conquest of China; the war against Japan from 1941 to 1945 to prevent the permanent conquest of Eastern Asia by the Japanese military empire; and the subsequent efforts to preserve Chinese independence, and, latterly, Korean independence—by virtue of all these actions it seems clear that the Government of the United States and a large proportion of the American people have been for a long time convinced that the countries of the Far East, including both the seaward islands and the mainland coasts of Siberia, Korea, China, and Indochina, do form an area of vital interest to the security of the United States. In the past, distance and unfamiliarity have combined to render difficult the formation of opinion in this country regarding the nature and extent of our vital interests in the Far East, though I imagine this is less true today than ever before. Yet, do we know how deeply into the Asiatic mainland this interest extends? How far south toward Malaya and Indonesia does this interest reach? Are Australia and New Zealand included within it? These are also things we must decide.

It is obvious that there is much less agreement about these last two great areas of vital interest—Western Europe and Eastern Asia—than about the first three I have cited. Therein lies the confusion, the bewilderment, the uncertainty which our people are daily voicing. Some are certain that both areas on the far shores of the oceans surrounding us are vital interests of the United States. Some are certain that neither is.

Others believe that the Atlantic coast of Europe is an essential area for our defense, while the Pacific coast of Asia is not. Still others believe the opposite is true. In addition, there are innumerable gradations of opinion giving various weights to the relative significance of these regions, and other shades of opinion that consider these areas as too narrowly or too broadly defined. At the root of such oversimplified and single-minded proposals as those advanced by the Europe-firsters, or the Asia-firsters, or the America-firsters, lie these fundamental differences over what are and what are not America's vital interests.

I do not see how we dare assume that there is basic unity behind our Nation's foreign policy, when there is no underlying agreement even on what our vital interests are, and where they are to be found. I see no point in pretending that these divisions of opinion do not exist. Every delivery of mail which comes to our desks shows that they exist. I do see great advantages in exposing these differences for all to see, so that we may debate them openly, honestly, and completely. To those who cry, "Beware, the Kremlin is listening," I would reply that these disagreements are a secret from no one, and as long as they persist, their effect will be to embitter American opinion itself and to poison relations with our strongest allies.

Beyond these vital interests to the security of the United States, and the geographical areas in which they lie, I shall not go in my enumeration, because they are of such extraordinary importance as to outclass any other interest, however real, to which we may point. There is no question that the United States has real, perhaps vital interests elsewhere in the world; they also merit our full attention.

We have troops in Germany, Austria, and Trieste. A Mediterranean country, Italy, is joined with us in the Atlantic Pact. We are furnishing military or economic assistance to Yugoslavia, Greece, Turkey, Iran, and, in the general area of China, to Indochina, Thailand, Indonesia, and Formosa. We have air bases in Lybia, Saudi Arabia, and elsewhere. Most of the oil for Western Europe comes from the fields of the Middle East. Under the concept of containment, which is frequently translated as meaning that the United States should oppose the expansion of Russian power anywhere beyond its 1945 perimeter, the vast regions to the south of the Soviet border would seem to form an area of very great importance.

Yet the interest of the United States in all these places, real and growing as it may be, is not generally considered as of the same order of importance as those in the five areas which I have described.

I hope I have made clear, Mr. President, that we have much to discuss before we have delineated the extent and the character and the order of importance of the areas that are, or may become, of vital interest to America's own defense.

AMERICA'S COMMITMENTS

When we come to the commitments which the United States has undertaken to protect and advance its vital interests, we find that, with several significant exceptions, the areas covered by our commitments coincide almost exactly with the great region within which America has her most vital interests. This is a reassuring discovery, since it suggests that, so far as interests and commitments go, ours are more or less in balance. The exceptions require a separate, most serious study.

I will say at once, Mr. President, that by a "commitment" I mean a solemn pledge, usually embodied in a treaty or agreement with one or more other governments, that the United States Government will go to war, if necessary, to protect the interest covered by the commitment. Again I am stressing the geographic character of commitments and the areas they are designed to cover.

I should remark at this point that I do not regard the so-called Truman Doctrine as a commitment, in the proper sense of the term, that has been undertaken by the Government of the United States. I realize that the word "commitment" is rather loosely employed, but I am defining it, for purposes of this discussion, as a solemn, binding pledge by our Government to engage in war, if need be, for the defense of a specified area of the world which we deem essential for the protection of our own national security. The Truman Doctrine is not a formal commitment of the character of the Rio Pact or the Atlantic Pact or the agreements such as have been made with the Philippine Government. It is not a pledge to defend a specified area of vital interest to American security. There are no treaties or executive agreements, so far as I know, which define this doctrine. It is not a legal commitment such as we have made under the United Nations Charter. To my knowledge, no congressional enactment has placed it on our statute books. The Truman doctrine is a declaration of principle or a pronouncement of intentions by the President of the United States, and is consequently and properly regarded as a proclamation of incontestable importance and vast implications. But it is not a commitment in the sense I have been employing this term.

Mr. President, in starting this survey I see no need for discussing our obligation to defend the territory and independence of the United States and its outlying possessions. We will fight for them no matter what it costs or how long it takes.

First. North America: We are committed to the defense of North America, and the obligation is formally recognized in a number of treaties and agreements with our neighbors. Our commitment to join Canada in her defense is partly set forth in the Ogdensburg agreement reached in August 1940 by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, which provided for establishment of a Permanent Joint Board of Defense "to consider in the broad sense the defenses of the north half of the hemisphere." On February 12, 1947, the postwar extension of this agreement and of the Defense Board was recognized in a joint statement by the two Governments. In view of our traditional friendship as well as of the realities of our position as mutually dependent on one another for the protection of the national security of both countries, no treaty, executive agreement, or contractual obligation was entered into. The agreement is none the less real.

Moreover, Canada and the United States are formally allied as signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty.

With regard to our other nearest neighbor there has been in existence since January 1942 a Joint Mexican-United States Defense Commission through which the Governments of this country and Mexico have been working together on common defense problems. As a signatory of the Rio Pact, of course, Mexico is formally allied with the United States and the other Latin-American countries.

It is inconceivable that we would not defend our closest neighbors as if they were ourselves.

Second. The Western Hemisphere: We are committed to the defense of the entire Western Hemisphere by the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance—the Rio Pact—which was ratified by the Senate in 1947. The essential article of this treaty, article 5, declares that "an armed attack by any state against any American state shall be considered as an attack against all the American states."

The security zone defined under article 4 includes all the countries of the Western Hemisphere, and embraces Alaska, the Aleutian Islands, Canada, and the Arctic islands lying to her north, Greenland, the Caribbean islands, and a segment of Antarctica.

Mr. President, exhibit A, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the end of my remarks, contains articles 3 and 4 of the Rio Pact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONRONEY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, while the treaty does not make the use of armed force obligatory by any party to it, it is a recognition of a fact that has been true, insofar as the United States is concerned, since the proclamation of the Monroe Doctrine and that is now formally affirmed by treaty—the United States will go to war, if necessary, to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of the Western Hemisphere.

Third. The North Atlantic: When the Senate ratified the North Atlantic Treaty in 1949, the United States became formally committed to the defense of the Atlantic Ocean north of the Tropic of Cancer, the sea approaches across the Atlantic, and all the countries lying on the European shores of the Atlantic except Spain and Germany, as well as of the western Mediterranean and the North Sea.

By article 5 of this treaty, "the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all." The same article also provides that if such armed attack occurs, each party will assist the party or parties attacked by taking forthwith "such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force."

The security zone defined by the Atlantic Pact in article 6 includes the territory of any of the parties in Europe, or North America, the Algerian departments of France, the occupation forces of any party in Europe, the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic north of the Tropic of Cancer, and also, the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the signatory powers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that exhibit B be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks. It contains articles 5 and 6 of the Atlantic Pact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, Senate Executive Report No. 8, Eighty-first Congress, first session, the report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee accompanying the North Atlantic Treaty, makes clear that our commitment under article 5 does not apply to any of the overseas territories outside the North Atlantic area. "The only outlying territories covered," it states, "are the islands of the North Atlantic area, Alaska, the Aleutian Islands, and the islands of the Canadian Arctic." Thus, our Atlantic commitment does not extend into Asia or Africa, except for the Algerian departments that are constitutionally part of metropolitan France.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Would it not be easier for the Senator to tell us what spots we are not going to defend than to tell us the spots we are going to defend? Have we not already taken in most of the earth?

Mr. GILLETTE. I am glad to say, in reply to the Senator's question, that on the next page of my address I shall cover the territory which is not covered by the commitments to which I have been referring.

Our commitment cannot be extended, even on the continent of Europe, without our permission. The treaty requires unanimous agreement to invite other states to join, and the report states that the committee was fully satisfied by the pledge of the President, delivered by the Secretary of State, "that he would consider the admission of a new member of the pact as the conclusion of a new treaty with that member, and would seek the advice and consent of the Senate to each such admission."

The following paragraph in the committee report seems of particular significance in the present connection, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to read it:

> We have learned that the security of the North Atlantic area is vital to our own peace and security. In accepting the obligations of the treaty, therefore, we merely make clear that we are following a course of action which we would follow without the treaty. If we were to accept the same commitments on a world-wide basis or in areas less vital to our national security, we might well run the danger of spreading ourselves too thin.

In the light of what I have been saying about balancing commitments and vital interests, Mr. President, I think this paragraph from the committee report also merits repetition at this moment:

> Suggestions have been made that the United States enter into similar pacts with countries in the Middle East and Pacific areas. During the hearings members of the committee questioned administration witnesses specifically on this point. It was established that the United States Government is not currently considering participation in any regional or collective defense arrangements.

To the best of my knowledge, this last statement still holds true. Therefore, the only two commitments of a collective, regional character that we have made, covering two areas of vital interest to the United States, are the Rio Pact and the Atlantic Pact—both of which, I need scarcely remark, have been duly ratified by the United States Senate.

Fourth. Occupation areas: We now come to another type of commitment, which, although not defined by treaty or agreement between governments, is nonetheless real. The existence of these obligations is known to everyone. They have been repeatedly considered and approved by the action of Congress. They are part of the heritage of World War II.

As aftermath of that war, the United States has found itself obliged to maintain occupation forces in Berlin and Western Germany, in Vienna and part of Austria, and on the islands of Japan. The presence of these occupation forces raises question as to the nature and extent of the American commitment in these countries, while at the same time confirming the existence of our obligation.

Our legal position in Western Germany is currently defined by a statute of occupation, yet with the establishment of a federal republic in that part of Germany and its rapid resumption of full sovereignty, the terms of the statute will certainly be modified soon if not abolished altogether. Then the role of United States troops in Germany will have to be settled by some new agreement, contract, or treaty. Meanwhile, since the North Atlantic Treaty provides that an attack on occupation troops of the signatory powers shall be considered in the same light as an attack on their territories, some measure of protection is already afforded West Germany under our Atlantic commitment. As in Austria, where, for lack of a treaty, the nature and extent of our commitments are in the realm of the undetermined, but where we have American forces stationed, so in Germany it would seem almost certain that an armed aggression against our occupation troops would be a cause of war—if indeed it were not the signal for an all-out invasion of the rest of Western Europe.

Similarly in Japan, where our legal position as chief occupying power is defined by international agreement, we must await negotiation of a treaty or contract with the Japanese Government before the American commitment in Japan is fully and clearly determined. For the present, it is virtually certain that an armed aggression against United States troops in Japan would be regarded by us as cause for war.

The Prime Minister of Japan, Shigeru Yoshida, writes in the current issue of Foreign Affairs that:

> American statesmen and military leaders have declared again and again the determination of the United States to hold on to its defense perimenter in the Pacific, a chain of islands running from the Aleutians to the Philippines, of which Japanese Islands form the central and vital link.

Mr. Yoshida also quotes Secretary Acheson's remarks of a year ago at the National Press Club in Washington, when the Secretary said:

> The defeat and disarmament of Japan have placed upon the United States the necessity of assuming the military defense of Japan so long as that is required, both in the interest of the security of the entire Pacific area and in the interest of Japan's security. I can assure you that there is no intention of any sort of abandoning or weakening the defense of Japan.

I believe, Mr. President, that it can safely be assumed, by us and by all others concerned, that, although we have not yet made formal treaties with Germany, Austria, and Japan, the United States is at present committed to fight for the protection of Western Germany, of that part of Austria not under Soviet occupation, and of the whole of Japan. While the legal right of American troops to be stationed in these occupied areas may not ever have been passed on as such by the Congress, we have repeatedly authorized and appropriated the necessary funds for maintaining the occupation forces. I am not aware that any question has ever been raised as to the moral obligation of the United States (and of the other occupying powers) to defend the defenseless peoples whose countries we are now occupying as a consequence of our military victory over the Axis powers.

It is a serious question, however, whether we have the power at present to fulfill these obligations, and this raises the further question as to whether we should augment our forces in those areas as rapidly as we can, so as to meet the unwritten but nevertheless real commitment we have assumed by our occupation of them since 1945. It will be for Congress to decide, moreover, if—when the occupations officially terminate—we are prepared to consider Western Germany, Austria, and Japan as falling within areas of vital interest to our country's defense.

Fifth. The Philippines: We turn to still another type of commitment. This one is based on the mutuality of interest which the United States and the Philippines continue to share even though the latter country has attained its full independence. On June 29, 1944, the Congress adopted a joint resolution authorizing the President to acquire bases in the Philippines for the mutual protection of the United States and that country. This agreement was signed at Manila on March 17, 1947. Its terms provide that the Governments of the two countries take the necessary measures to promote their mutual security and to defend their territories and areas. We are therefore committed formally to the defense of our bases in the Philippine Islands, and it is impossible to ignore the implication that the agreement also commits us to defend the whole of the Philippine Islands. As a result of an executive agreement authorized in advance by congressional action, the vital interest we have had since the opening of the century is now matched with a commitment to defend it.

Sixth. The Pacific islands: Along the sea and air approaches to the United States across the Pacific Ocean we have commitments to defend a large number of islands. Some, like the Marshalls, the Marianas, and the Carolines, we administer under United Nations trusteeship. Others are smaller Japanese islands taken by right of conquest and held pending negotiation of a peace treaty with Japan. As occupying power and as possessor of important bases, we are committed to defend Okinawa and the other Ryukyu Islands, Iwo Jima, and the Bonin Islands.

This completes my list of commitments undertaken by our Government for the protection of areas of vital interest to American security. Other than the defense of its own island possessions, such as Hawaii, Midway, or Guam, the United States has no commitments to defend areas of the world outside the Western Hemisphere, the North Atlantic, Western Europe, including occupation zones and adjacent waters—but not including Sweden, Finland, Switzerland, Spain, Yugoslavia, or Greece—the islands of Japan, the Philippines, and certain South Pacific islands. All of these commitments, which imply where they do not specifically state it, constitute pledges by the United States to go to war, if necessary, for the defense of the area covered by the commitment, whether made by treaty, by executive agreement, or by virtue of the presence of American military forces.

Thus, unless my information is faulty—and I welcome corrections where I am wrong—it is not true, as has been rather recklessly charged from time to time, that the administration has made commitments of this life-and-death character without congressional approval or knowledge, except in the sense that negotiations with foreign governments sometimes have created a moral obligation on Congress to ratify or legislate in order to back up diplomatic arrangements on which we are not consulted in advance.

Mr. President, in making that statement, I do not want to be understood by implication to mean that I have approved of all such commitments. In my short address today I am trying—and perhaps I am taking too long—to outline the situation so that our people may know what commitments have been made when they ask, "Why here?" or "Why there?" They should know the answer when they ask, "What responsibility do we have? Why are we going to send our troops here, or there? Under what authority are we doing it? Under whose authority is the action being taken? Who has exceeded his authority?" I have tried to present a survey of the whole field of commitments which have actually been made. In every instance which I have mentioned the commitment was made with the consent of Congress. Although I have criticized the leadership, and still expect to criticize it, it is not fair to say that authority was assumed or usurped in any instance I have mentioned.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LANGER. It is true, is it not, that every Republican who is now criticizing the President on the question of sending troops voted a great number of times for the other commitments?

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator from North Dakota is correct, as he almost always is.

There is one commitment made in this past year by the President which did not take the form of a treaty or an agreement and which was not assumed as a legal commitment under the United Nations Charter. This was the President's order to the Seventh Fleet to neutralize the island of Formosa. In effect, this amounted to a commitment to protect Formosa from invasion by the Chinese Communists. Yet it has never been established by any congressional decision that Formosa is to be regarded as an area of vital interest to the United States. On January 21 of this year, however, Ambassador Gross, our deputy delegate to the United Nations, indicated that there has been such a decision reached on the highest level of our Government.

I shall now read what Ambassador Gross stated.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETTE. Of course, I am glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. Was Congress aware and did Congress give its consent to the Russian order with respect to the city of Berlin which caused the United States and its allies, especially the United States, to undertake the airlift in order to supply Berlin?

Mr. GILLETTE. I presume the Senator is referring to the agreements reached at Tehran and Yalta.

Mr. THYE. That is correct. Was Congress aware of the fact that such a situation was to be established, which was to cause our Nation the expense, both in dollars and in physical equipment, and the loss of our men, in order to supply the United States sector of Berlin with food when the Russians imposed their embargo?

Mr. GILLETTE. To the best of my recollection, there was no such information given to the Congress of the United States. I was a Member of the Senate at the time. However, I ask the Senator from Minnesota to keep in mind that when the agreements were negotiated in Tehran and Yalta we were engaged in the Second World War. It was during the war that we entered into the agreements. Again I may say, having some inside information at the time of the character of the agreements, I was not one who approved. The fact remains that they were in the nature of military agreements which were made to meet an exigency of war which was very real at the time. I do not know whether, had I been representing the United States at one of the conferences, I would have agreed to what was agreed to by the then President of the United States, and in the conclusions which were reached. I have sometimes questioned whether I would or would not. However, if my recollection serves me correctly—and I hope it does—at that time there was serious doubt with respect to overtures which we were told had been made by the Central Powers to Russia to make a separate peace, to take Russia out of the war so that the Central Powers would not be compelled to fight on two fronts, but could concentrate their forces to meet our attack across the Channel on the Normandy coast.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETTE. Let me finish this point.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further on that point?

Mr. GILLETTE. Let me finish, please.

The fact that it was militarily impossible, in the opinion of our best military minds, for us to meet the German might on one front. It was necessary that Russia should stay in the war so that the Central Powers could be divided and compelled to meet an attack from two fronts. That necessity was so vital and so real that, much as I deplore some of the agreements which were made at the places mentioned by the Senator and mentioned by me, if I had been there, knowing what the result might have been if we had refused to accede to demands of that kind, I am not sure what I would have done. I have asked myself over and over again, if the question had been placed before me for decision, what my answer would have been. Perhaps if I had been there I would not be so critical as I have been of those who entered into such agreements.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THYE. There has always been a question in my mind as to what the United States leaders were thinking of when they made such grave concessions to a country such as Soviet Russia. Whether they were military men who sat in the conferences, or whether they were diplomatic representatives of our Government, with the then President, what were men thinking of when they made such grave concessions, when the cordon about Berlin was acceded to? The same thing was true of Vienna, and all of eastern Austria. The productivity of Austria was yielded to Russian control. Those two examples on the European continent would lead us to question the wisdom of those decisions.

The next question, of course, is with respect to Manchuria. An agreement was entered into that Russia should have control over that vast area of China. Then there was the decision as to the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea. Some very serious commitments were made, of which Congress was not aware. That leads us today to be more critical and more demanding in our desire to know what the commitments are. The Senator and I are today attempting to avoid mistakes such as those which have proved to be so terrifically costly to this Nation. They have caused us a great deal of expense in the South Pacific, and have resulted in the loss of many of our youths in the very flower of life.

All this was the result of mistakes in years past. For that reason some of us are asking today that no more secret commitments be made. We say to our leaders, "Let us know what you are thinking. Let us know what plans and agreements you are entering into before you commit this Nation." I can only say to the very able Senator from Iowa that although those commitments may have seemed wise under the pressure of war, yet they were far-reaching and very heavily weighted.

Men should not make such commitments unbeknown to those who are elected by the people of the Republic. The Members of the House are elected every 2 years, and one-third of the membership of this body is elected every 2 years. We are the ones who must answer to the people in our respective districts or States as to what is being committed and what is being done by the Government. Unless we are informed, and unless we can know today, tomorrow, and in years to come, to what this Government commits itself and what agreements it enters into, we are not going to be able to defend our action, nor can we in any sense exercise the responsibilities with which those who elected us entrusted us.

Personally I hope that there will be sufficient respect for the legislative branch on the part of the Executive and the State Department to be frank and honest and give us information as to what they are confronted with, and what the plans and commitments of the United States are to be.

I thank the Senator for yielding so much time to me.

Mr. GILLETTE. It was a pleasure to yield to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. Let me say that I am in accord with his statesmanlike remarks. In addition to some of the commitments to which he referred, other commitments were made at that time which seemed necessary to meet the exingencies of the situation. I have mentioned them over the years. I question now, and will question so long as I am a Member of the United States Senate, the commitment of this Nation under usurped authority, authority which no agency of the Government possesses, without going through the constitutional processes under which recognition is given to the responsibility of the legislative branch.

The question which the Senator just asked was in accord with his responsibility as a Senator from the State of Minnesota. He is discharging his duty. He does not need to apologize for it.

What I have tried to do in the outline which I have given here today is to answer the questions which the people are asking the Senator from Minnesota and me and every other Senator—such questions as, "Why are we doing this?" or "Under what authority is that being done?" I have tried, by a survey, to show the commitments which have been made. I have quoted from them, and have read them, telling when they were were made, and when the Congress, by action, gave its approval. I am not by implication or suggestion—heaven forbid—giving my endorsement to commitments which have not been reached through constitutional processes. I assure the able Senator that I very much appreciate his contribution.

Mr. THYE. I thank the Senator for yielding so much time.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. I was not in the Senate during the years referred to by the Senator from Iowa. I assume, of course, that the agreements reached at Yalta and Tehran were neither reported to nor approved by the United States Senate. But is it not a fact that agreements which were made under other circumstances and in different areas also were not reported to or agreed to or approved by the United States Senate?

I have in mind, for example, the great conference which was held at Casablanca. As a result of that conference, which was not reported to or approved by the Senate, we were able, in conjunction with our allies, to drive the German forces out of Africa and to make safe the entire Middle East. We were enabled to develop an easy and rapid route to India, and to provide for the invasion of Sicily, and finally of Italy.

Is it not also true that the historic agreement which was entered into in 1943 or 1944 to open up a second front in the war by an invasion of Normandy on the north and of Italy on the south, was not reported to or approved by the Senate? Yet I cannot believe that anyone would question the wisdom or necessity of those great and historic movements. Had those agreements not been made by those who were fighting shoulder to shoulder with us, on our side, the entire history of the world, in my opinion, might readily have been changed.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator from New York.

I may add to what I have already said that at the time I was critical when information came to me of the purported agreements which had been made. I questioned very much whether they should have been made. But I repeat what I said a moment ago, that I have asked myself hundreds of times whether, had I been in the same position of those then in authority, had I been President of the United States or authorized to speak for the United States, I would not have entered into the same agreements.

If, for instance, word came to me—and it did come to me indirectly at that time—that Germany had made overtures to the Soviet Union for a separate peace, what would I have done had I been in authority? Let us assume that Germany had said, in effect, to Russia, "What are you fighting for? What do you want? You have been bled white? You have killed millions of our boys and we have killed millions of your boys. What do you want? Do you want the Dardanelles? All right, you may have them. Do you want a warm seaport in the Adriatic? All right, you may have it. Do you want the Baltic States, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia? All right, you may have them. What do you want? Do you want these things? Then why do you continue to be a cat's-paw for Great Britain and the United States, if you can obtain the things you want? We will give you everything you want if you will make peace with us now."

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THYE. It would be difficult for any nation to feel it was a cat's-paw after an invading army had driven into it and had destroyed many of its cities, as the Hitler arm had destroyed many of the cities of Russia, had devastated the countryside, had bled white great districts of the country by killing or taking captive many of its children, women, and men—all who were not in the military forces. It would be quite difficult for Russia, facing an enemy such as Hitler's army, which had so invaded it and had so destroyed many of its cities, to think of giving up and not seeking revenge.

I believe that Russia was seeking revenge, and that our Nation, the United States of America, did not have to plead with or beg very strongly that Russia continue in the war. It was not necessary for the United States to give an assurance to Russia that she could have Poland, that she could have Eastern Germany, that she could have the city of Berlin, with the land immediately surrounding it, and with no corridor for us to enter Berlin. It was not necessary to give to Russia eastern Austria, with all its industrial potentialities, leaving only the mountainous summer resort area of Austria under the control of the countries that were allies of the United States.

So I say that we must have to draw on our imagination to quite an extent to reach the conclusion that we had to make overtures to Russia in order to keep Russia with us in the war, after Hitler's army had invaded Russia, destroyed so many of its cities, mutilated its manpower, annihilated the resources of the section of Russia the Hitler army entered, and committed unspeakable acts of cruelty against the women, the children, and the aged of Russia. We will have to draw quite strongly on our imagination to be able to say that we had to make overtures to Russia to induce her to remain in the war.

Mr. GILLETTE. In view of what the able Senator from Minnesota has just said, I withdraw the complete endorsement I gave to his remarks made a little while ago. I cannot follow him into the realm of conjecture. I cannot follow him into the realm of what might have been. The fact of the matter is that we were faced with a military situation, as I recall conditions at that time, preparing for an attack across the Channel, an invasion of the Normandy coast, which at best was a terrible and a dangerous venture. It was an impossible venture if the Central Powers could bring their whole force to bear. We could not at that time enter into the conjectural field and say, "Well, maybe Russia will not make peace with Germany. Maybe she will recall the German attack on Stalingrad. Maybe she will recall the devastation of the Ukraine. Maybe she will not make peace. But maybe she will."

Mr. McMAHON and Mr. THYE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. GILLETTE. I will yield as soon as I complete my statement. If she had made peace with Germany would we not have been in a dangerous position? We would have been in an impossible position militarily. Again I say that perhaps no man has been more critical than I have of the concessions which have been made to Russia; but I recognize the realities, and I repeat, I have asked myself over and over again: What would I have done had I been in the position of authority and a military decision had to be made? Yes, a military decision in connection with implementing a policy that was laid down by allied nations.

Will the able Senator from Minnesota excuse me while I yield to the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON]?

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I had just one thought in that connection. I may say, if the Senator will be kind enough to yield one more moment, that if my memory serves me a right, Russia was insisting and criticizing the United States and countries allied with us because we did not establish a second front in order to give Russia a little relief from the full impact of Hitler's army.

Mr. GILLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. THYE. So, I think Russia was pleading with and begging us, and we were not at that particular time the one that was begging and pleading with Russia to remain in the struggle. Russia was the country that was begging of us to establish a second front. Yet we made the concession with regard to the city of Berlin, with no corridor for us to get into it, and the concession with respect to Vienna, and the concession dividing Germany and dividing Austria. For that reason I feel that in the event Congress had had an opportunity to look at the chapters which were being written then, we might have been a little bit more realistic and not been quite so generous in the concessions which were made at that particular time.

Mr. GILLETTE. I think that is undoubtedly true, but it was information which could not have been given out at that time when we were at war with the Central Powers, and confronting the greatest military force that had ever been assembled. The measures were those which were taken to meet the problems which arose as to whether we would establish two fronts or whether we must concentrate on one. The fear that we could not cope with the enemy on more than one front was information which could not have been made available at that time. The enemy had enough information as it was respecting our military potential, so we could not make that information available to them.

Mr. McMAHON and Mr. FERGUSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut, after which I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. McMAHON. I wish to compliment the Senator from Iowa on his intellectual integrity. The Senator from Iowa is trying to place himself in the position of the men who were at the conference and who were connected with the events which took place at the time, rather than trying to be a grandstand quarterback. I suppose the greatest example of the reiteration of errors being accepted as true is the constant outpouring we have heard in this Chamber about the conferences held at Yalta, Tehran and Potsdam. I desire to say now that Winston S. Churchill was the signatory for Great Britain to every one of the documents. I do not believe there are many who will rise to challenge the statement that he has been one of the great leaders of history. He is a man known for his perspicacity in matters pertaining to military strategy.

The Senator is correct in saying that these were military agreements made in the face of information the men in authority had at the time. At Yalta they were told that we would lose a million more men upon the shores of Japan if an invasion were made of that country. Perhaps that invasion would not have taken place, and it did not take place, but that is one of the factors which Mr. Churchill, as well as Mr. Roosevelt, had to weigh.

I should like to point out to the Senator from Minnesota that so far as the Potsdam Agreement is concerned, Mr. Churchill was at Potsdam for two-thirds of that conference; and he, too, approved the agreement. I, for one, am looking forward with a great deal of anticipation to Mr. Churchill's forthcoming book, in which he will discuss his participation in those conferences, because I think it will do much to correct some of the misapprehensions about them.

Mr. President, the present difficulties in the world have been caused, not by the agreements which were made at those conferences, but by the breaking of those agreements. At those conferences, free elections in Poland were promised. However, we know that free elections in Poland did not occur. When that promise was broken, we had the choice of doing one of two things: Either do what we did, and swallow the fact of the breaking of the promise; or else make war to enforce the promise. At that time I did not hear from any Member of this body, any Member either on the other side of the aisle or on this side of the aisle, a suggestion that we go to war.

At the time when the Yalta conference was held, there was no assurance that the atomic bomb would be used, and would be used effectively. There was no assurance that we would not soon find our forces fighting the enemy on the mainland of Japan. I, for one, think it was necessary at that time to do all that possibly could be done to insure that Russia would agree to join us in the war in the Far East; for if at that time things had not turned out as they subsequently did, and if it had not been found, subsequently, that we did not need to have the Russians come into the struggle in the Far East, we would have had to make—alone—that invasion, an invasion in which hundreds of thousands of American boys would have died on the shores of Japan.

So, Mr. President, it is easy enough to answer after the event has occurred. However, that does not alter the situation and the problems confronting our leaders at the time when those conferences were held.

So I am delighted that the Senator from Iowa has raised this question. It is something upon which the American people need education. I wish to say that when all the ills of which we are now the victim are paraded as being the result of the conferences at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, I, for one, will rise to challenge that thesis, because I think such a conclusion is demonstrably in error and can be refuted.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the Senator from Iowa distinguish between agreements of the kind referred to by the Senator from New York, in connection with the landing of troops at Normandy, and the agreements which were made in regard to the way we would fight the war in North Africa—agreements purely and simply as to military, strategic acts—as compared with the agreement made at Yalta, in which a division of the world was agreed upon? Does not the Senator distinguish between those two kinds of agreements, one of which was of immediate military importance and the other of long-range political significance?

Mr. GILLETTE. Certainly, Mr. President, I see a difference. However, all the agreements which have been referred to in the debate were made in the light of a military need and the necessity for military implementation. There were differences. One could be a strategic decision; one could be made on the field of battle; or one could involve other areas of land or an over-all picture of the area or of the cementing factors in connection with which the Allied Powers had formed a coalition. Of course there are differences. However, there is the one common denominator, namely, that all those agreements were made in time of war, and to carry out a military mission.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GILLETTE. Of course.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true that the Potsdam agreement was made after the end of the war in Europe?

Mr. GILLETTE. Oh yes. The colloquy I had with the Senator from Minnesota was with reference to Tehran and Yalta.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Tehran agreement was made in December 1943; the Yalta agreement was made in February 1945; and the Potsdam agreement was made in August 1945.

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes. In our colloquy, no reference was made to the Potsdam agreement. It was mentioned by the able Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] has now said those agreements have been breached by the Soviet Union. Does not the Senator agree that because of the breach of those agreements, they are no longer binding upon the United States of America, even if they ever had any binding effect? Is not that a fact?

Mr. GILLETTE. If the Senator from Connecticut said that, at least I did not draw that conclusion from what he said.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did he not say those agreements had been breached by the other side?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will yield, let me say that I did say that; but I drew no conclusion that the breaching of them by the Soviet Union released us from the obligations we had assumed. I do not pass on that point at all. I am interested about the conclusion the Senator from Michigan wishes to draw from the fact that they have been breached, and I am interested in knowing what he thinks the breaching of them gives us a right to do.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I wish to draw this conclusion, and I now state it on the floor of the Senate——

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator is nowhere else.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish to draw the conclusion that the United States of America should repudiate those agreements, first, on the ground that there was no authority, under the Constitution of the United States, to make them; and, second, that even if they were made with authority—and they were not—they have been repudiated by the other party, and, therefore, have no more binding effect upon the United States of America, and the time has arrived when they should be repudiated.

Mr. McMAHON. Very well; so now they are repudiated. So what? What does the Senator want us to do now?

Mr. McFARLAND, Mr. FERGUSON, and Mr. LEHMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield first to the distinguished Senator from Arizona, the majority leader; and then I shall yield to the Senator from New York—assuming that the Senator from Michigan has concluded.

Mr. FERGUSON. I have other questions to ask, but I am willing to wait.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, let me ask the distinguished Senator from Iowa whether I correctly summarize the statement he has made: We followed a certain course during the war, and we won the war. Now no one, even if he is critical of that course, can truthfully say that he knows we would have won the war if we had followed a different course.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator from Arizona for that contribution.

Now I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Michigan has tried to differentiate between the kind of agreement made at Casablanca, and in connection with the invasion of Normandy, and the Tehran and Yalta agreements.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will yield, let me say I did not try to differentiate or distinguish between them; I did distinguish between them.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Michigan, if I may, that there is no distinction, for the agreements reached at Yalta and the agreements reached at Tehran were just as definitely military in character as were the other agreements to which reference has been made.

I am quite certain that the distinguished Senator from Michigan will realize that the agreement which was made at Tehran was the one under which the Soviet Government promised its aid in liberating China and in saving the United States the rigors and agony of acting alone in the invasion of Japan.

This afternoon I have heard statements made which are so typical, in my opinion, of many pieces of wisdom which come after the act, instead of before it. The impression has been given here that at the end of 1944 the war was over, and that we did not have to make any concessions to the Soviet Government or use such influence and power as we had to get Russia to join us in the war in the Far East.

Mr. President, I happened to be in France in December 1944. Prior to that time, everything from a military standpoint had been going along splendidly. However, as the Members of the Senate will recall, on or about December 1, 1944, and for a month thereafter, the Battle of the Bulge occurred. Having been fairly near the scene of that battle, I can say to the Senate—of course, I realize that some of our colleagues may have forgotten about this, because it occurred 6 years ago—that the people of France, who had been liberated only several months before then, and the people of Great Britain, and, I am very confident, the people of the United States, were very much frightened at the developments which had occurred because of the progress made by the Nazis in the Battle of the Bulge.

It is all very fine to say now that we should have done this or should have done that; but I admire the Senator from Iowa very greatly for having had the courage to say here what many of us have felt, and what some of us have publicly expressed, that it is much easier to criticize after the fact, and to be wise after the fact, than before.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEHMAN. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. THYE. It will take me only a moment.

Mr. GILLETTE. I hope Senators will be a little more considerate. I have been on my feet for almost 2 hours, and I am an old man.

Mr. THYE. The Senator looks very young, I may say.

Mr. GILLETTE. I should like to conclude. In view of the fact that the Senator from Michigan engaged in colloquy with the Senator from New York, I should yield to him briefly, and then to the Senator from Nevada; and then, if my good neighbor, the Senator from Minnesota, insists, I shall yield very briefly to him.

Mr. THYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, in order that the RECORD may be correct, I merely want to call attention to the fact that the landing in Normandy occurred on June 6, 1944.

Mr. LEHMAN. I believe that is the date I gave in my brief remarks.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true that the Senator from Iowa has sought in his remarks today to leave the impression that the United States of America was threatened with a representation that, unless we made the agreements at Tehran and Yalta, which have been described here, our ally, the Soviet Union, was going to desert the ship and go back to the Germans, where it had been previously? We, of course, know that the Russians originally had a treaty of friendship with the Germans, which they repudiated. The effect of their deserting the Germans ultimately brought them side by side with America, Great Britain, and the other allies, but is not the Senator trying to indicate that they were about to go back to the Germans unless we made these agreements? If that is true, then were the agreements not made under such threats, such blackmail, that they should no longer be considered binding upon the United States?

Mr. GILLETTE. I should not want to draw any such conclusion. I may say in reply to the distinguished Senator that I not only wanted to leave the impression to which he just referred, but those of us who were accorded information at the time were told definitely that that was a factor, and that it was a fact that that possibility was considered—not a probability, not a possibility, but a fact—and in connection with a military decision, every factor must be taken into consideration. Whether they would have done it or not, I do not know.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator has indicated that he was "in the know."

Mr. GILLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan certainly was not.

Mr. GILLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator from Iowa has been here a number of years, and it is surprising how infrequently he has been let in "on the know." In fact, the Senator from Iowa has often felt that the door was definitely closed against him.

Mr. FERGUSON. Would the Senator say that he and the Senator from Michigan fared about equally in that respect? But is it not true that the President of the United States, returning to this country, stated to a joint session of the Congress that no agreements had been made that affected the Pacific War or the Far East, whereas we now know that very extensive and very serious agreements of a political nature affecting the Far East were made with the Russians?

Mr. GILLETTE. Is the Senator referring to the Potsdam agreement?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I am referring to the Yalta agreement.

Mr. GILLETTE. My memory does not serve me on that.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am sure the record will show that; and I was wondering how, with that statement in the RECORD, it would be possible for the Senator from Iowa to know that there was a threat sufficient to cause the yielding to these agreements.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator from Iowa at that time was a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The information to which I have alluded — perhaps unfortunately, at this time—was information which I gained at that time. It was certainly a factor in the conclusions which were reached.

I yield now to the Senator from Nevada.

WE GAVE MANCHURIA, BERLIN, AND NORTH KOREA AWAY WITHOUT SAFEGUARD

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, inasmuch as we are endeavoring to keep the record straight, I should like to ask the Senator a question in line with the discussion between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Connecticut. I should like to ask him whether it is not a fact that the Yalta agreement virtually gave, or had the effect of giving Manchuria to the Russians; in other words, through turning over the transportation systems and the harbors to the Russians we gave them control of Manchuria—the bread basket of China. Is not that true?

In addition, it was without the knowledge of the Chinese themselves, or of the Nationalist Government which was in power at the time; and later pressure was brought to bear on Chiang Kai-shek to accept the agreement.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator from Nevada. I may say in reply that, trusting entirely to memory, I have been forced far afield in this discussion. I was discussing an entirely different matter. I was attempting, in my poor way, to cover the field of commitments which we have undoubtedly made, and obligations under which we are now functioning; so that I, along with other Senators, could give something by way of answer to our people when they ask, "Why are we doing this? Why are we doing that? Under what authority are we doing it?" We should have something definite to present in reply.

I wish to add—and then I hope the Senator will excuse me—that no Member of the Senate will fight any more strenuously than will the junior Senator from Iowa any attempt on the part of the executive department or of the judicial department to infringe upon the responsibilities and duties of the legislative department. On this floor I have, in times past, made a very lengthy talk on the question of the execution of agreements by the executive department without submission to the Congress.

If the Senator will bear with me, I shall repeat what I said on that occasion. I submitted to the State Department at the time a query as to what it considered a treaty which must be submitted to the Senate for ratification, and what it considered an executive agreement. The reply of the State Department, which I have in my file, stated the difference in this way: A treaty is a contract which must be submitted to the Senate for ratification; an executive agreement is one which does not have to be submitted to the Senate. I cited at that time something I had heard as a boy. I was told the way to distinguish a male pigeon from a female. The method was, to put corn in front of the bird; if he picked it up, it was a he; and if she picked it up, it was a she.

Mr. President, so long as I can speak, and so long as I am a Member of the Senate, speaking on this floor, I shall jealously fight to the extent of my ability in defense of the responsibility and authority of this legislative body under the Constitution of the United States.

Let me repeat that I merely wanted today to outline the kinds of obligations which had been ratified, commitments which had been made and either expressly or by implication had been ratified by the Senate of the United States. I had no desire, and I certainly did not expect, to discuss the agreements made at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, under the personal guidance of the Senator from Minnesota or the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief moment?

Mr. GILLETTE. I had not quite finished.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I should like to get on the record one more date, namely, of the Cairo Conference of November 22 to November 26, 1943.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom did the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I understood the Senator yielded to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GILLETTE. I had been yielding to the Senator from Michigan. I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I hope I have not diverted the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa from his theme. I had no intention of doing that. On the contrary, I want to compliment him on the job he is doing in documenting this evidence, because it is very important. We gave Berlin to the Russians without any means of egress or ingress. I shall not take the time of the Senate now to enumerate the many other instances when similar serious mistake were made. I have in times past stated them to the Senate in some detail.

Russia actually entered the war 2 days after the first atom bomb was exploded in Japan. I suppose she waited to see whether the bomb would actually explode. The distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut indicated that the reason we wanted to assure ourselves of Russia's support was that maybe we were not sure the atom bomb would explode.

Mr. President, of course, it was, and is well known that Japan had been trying for a considerable time to surrender before we used the bomb and before Russia came in.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, the only reason for making the comments I made when the very able Senator from Iowa was speaking was to endeavor to get all the facts in the RECORD. I like the Senator from Iowa too well to disagree with him.

I am reminded of the old Chinese proverb, which is as follows:

> Look back that you have the wisdom to intelligently look forward.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, since the Senator has been kind enough to refer to my courtesy, I hope he will continue to be kind enough to permit me to conclude my remarks.

I was about to read what Ambassador Gross said, as follows:

> We have reserved and continue to reserve the right to make certain that the question of Formosa will be handled in a way completely consistent with our national interest and security.

It might be wise, Mr. President, if this is the official American position with regard to one of the most controversial areas on earth, for a resolution to be considered by the Congress supporting, or rejecting, that position, so that there will be no doubt anywhere of our intention. Certainly, before we are committed to go to war, if necessary, in the defense of Formosa, Congress must agree, and express its agreement, that Formosa is a vital interest to American security. Once this has been determined, we can then determine the relative importance of Formosa in our scale of vital interests in the Far East, as lesser or greater or equal to American interests in Japan or the Philippines; and with these factors in mind we can more readily determine the nature and the extent of the commitment we shall make for its defense. Should it be the judgment of Congress that America has no vital interest in Formosa, we would of course take a quite different course. All I am asking is that the determination be made, one way or the other.

THE AREA OF THE GAP

The United States, as we have seen, has commitments in one form or another from the Adriatic coast of Italy westward across the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to the western shores of the Japanese and Philippine Islands. Nowhere east of the boot of Italy, all the way eastward through the Mediterranean, the Middle East and into Southeast Asia up to the Pacific shores of Indochina, is the United States committed by treaty, agreement, occupation force or otherwise, to go to war for the defense of any country lying along that huge stretch of territory.

Our military assistance goes to many of the countries in this area but this in no sense obligates us to go to their defense. As things now stand, the only way we could become involved in any outbreak along this line would be in case the United Nations took action recommending or deciding that the United States and other members send forces for the defense of a country attacked in that area.

Yet this immense territory, extending from the middle of the Mediterranean to the Pacific shores of Indochina, lies along the longest land frontier of the Soviet orbit. At no point thereon is the United States, except by United Nations action, pledged to the defense of a victim of aggression.

There are sound historical reasons for this. In our time, this whole stretch has been largely a zone of British, and to a lesser extent, French influence, vying, of course, with Russian influence, both czarist and Communist. America's interests there have certainly grown greater since the war. The first application of the doctrine of containment, if you wish to interpret it as such, came in Greece and Turkey. Even prior to that, in the late winter of 1946, we countered the Soviet pressure on Iran and were able to keep the Russian power from pouring into that country. The great oil fields of the Middle East, which we have both an economic and a strategic stake in keeping out of Soviet hands, are an area of real importance to the United States.

If these areas should be lost to Soviet control, there is no knowing how far the disaster might spread: Europe deprived at a stroke of its source of oil, the Suez Canal overrun, Africa laid open to penetration and conquest, 400,000,000 Hindus and Pakistanis swallowed up into the manpower machine of the Soviet Union.

Here is the great gap in application of the doctrine of containment. Here the United States has defined no truly vital interests; at least it is most doubtful if the American people are now persuaded that such interests exist. Here we have no firm commitments to go to war for our own defense by defending these distant regions. Here we have no sufficient power to fulfill commitments even if we had them.

The primary responsibility for guarding this area is not America's. That responsibility lies chiefly with the British Commonwealth of Nations, and is shared at the Far East terminal by France in Indochina. The Commonwealth countries having vital interests in this region would seem to include the United Kingdom, India, Pakistan, and Ceylon, in the front rank, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the other British African states in the second rank.

American interests may be great in this area, especially in checking expansion of Soviet power, but they do not appear to be vital interests to the same degree as the areas surrounding the oceans between which we live. Our role there is necessarily secondary, subsidiary, and auxiliary.

If the day should come when a commitment to go to the defense of this vast region, or any part of it, is proposed to the American people, I hope and pray that we will have long since reached an agreement among ourselves whether or not, in the light of our long-range security, of the techniques of modern warfare and of the global situation vis-à-vis the Soviet Union, the United States does have vital interests in that area, interests so vital to our Nation's security that we must engage in war if need be to protect them.

CONCLUSION

Before closing, Mr. President, I want to touch only for a moment on the question of the power we shall need to fulfill the commitments we have made or may be compelled to make to protect our vital interests.

The chief domestic issues which we will debate in this Congress are meaningless except in terms of our foreign policy. Foreign policy today is the determinant of domestic policy. Taxes, production, manpower, prices, wages, profits, housing—all these basic issues of national policy cannot even be discussed except in relation to what our foreign policy is and is going to be. The decisions we make this year and next will shadow all we think and feel and do for decades to come, indefinitely. Military expenditures this coming fiscal year will take 73 cents of each budget dollar. How many men, tanks, trucks, planes, ships, bombs; how much wheat, cotton, and meat; what rate of taxes and how much debt; all these depend on the power we intend to mobilize. But how much power must we have? What areas will our forces protect? Where shall they be sent if total war is deferred but the permanent crisis goes on? Answers can be found only in what our foreign policy requires, and what that policy requires can most easily be seen by studying the geography of our position.

Mr. President, because of my strong conviction that we must reach agreement on the essentials before we can agree on ways and means, I have not proposed answers of my own to the questions I have raised. Let us by all means debate frankly and freely, but let us debate with a view ultimately of forging an ironclad base of fundamental agreement. On this base, and only on this base, can we construct an enduring and effective foreign policy suited to the age in which we live.

ARTICLES 3 AND 4

INTER-AMERICAN TREATY OF RECIPROCAL ASSISTANCE

Article 3

1. The high contracting parties agree that an armed attack by any state against an American state shall be considered as an attack against all the American states, and, consequently, each one of the said contracting parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

2. On the request of the state or states directly attacked and until the decision of the organ of consultation of the inter-American system, each one of the contracting parties may determine the immediate measures which it may individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of continental solidarity. The organ of consultation shall meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken.

3. The provisions of this article shall be applied in case of any armed attack which takes place within the region described in article 4 or within the territory of an American state. When the attack takes place outside of the said areas the provisions of article 6 shall be applied.

4. Measures of self-defense provided for under this article may be taken until the Security Council of the United Nations has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

Article 4

The region to which this treaty refers is bounded as follows: Beginning at the North Pole; thence due south to a point 74 degrees north latitude, 10 degrees west longitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point 47 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, 50 degrees west longitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point 35 degrees north latitude, 60 degrees west longitude; thence due south to a point in 20 degrees north latitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point 5 degrees north latitude, 24 degrees west longitude; thence due south to the South Pole; thence due north to a point 30 degrees south latitude, 90 degrees west longitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point on the Equator at 97 degrees west longitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point 15 degrees north latitude, 120 degrees west longitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point 50 degrees north latitude, 170 degrees east longitude; thence due north to a point in 54 degrees north latitude; thence by a rhumb line to a point 65 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, 168 degrees 58 minutes 5 seconds west longitude; thence due north to the North Pole.

EXHIBIT B

ARTICLES 5 AND 6

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Article 5

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

For the purpose of article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the occupation forces of any party in Europe, on the islands under the jurisdiction of any party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer or on the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the parties.

THE RAILROAD STRIKE

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Senate has had the opportunity of listening this afternoon to some very able speeches, particularly one by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and one by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. President, the Nation has suffered a paralyzing railroad strike, and it is not over yet. The stoppage of rail transportation as a result of "sickness" among employees of operating brotherhoods is so ridiculous that mention of it is nauseating.

No officer or member of the brotherhoods has offered to condone this type of curtailment of railroad transportation.

After studying the chronological record of the conductors' and trainmen's wage dispute, one must admit that it has been poorly handled; in fact, it has been mismanaged and mishandled.

In checking this case history, one must conclude that the administration did not have the courage to act and act properly. When the President of the United States provided for Government seizure of the railroads on August 25, 1950, he became directly responsible for the continued operation of the railroads.

It is not my intention to discuss the merits or the demerits of the agreement signed at the White House on December 21, 1950, or the rejection of the settlement by the general chairmen of the trainmen's organization on January 5, 1951, and the rejection by the general chairmen of the conductors' organization on January 7, 1951.

There are always two sides to a question involving wages and working conditions. As Governor of the State of Kansas, I had an opportunity to sit, with other governors of States traversed by the Missouri Pacific lines, in arriving at a settlement of the strike and wage dispute last year. This gave me an opportunity to study the problems that are presented to both the employer and the employees. At that meeting the governors and the representatives of the governors of the States were able to work out an agreement that brought about immediate operation of the railroads.

It is my contention that the administration should have acted similarly in the present situation. The fact that they did not take advantage of this opportunity and use the full influence of their offices has cost the Nation and will continue to cost the Nation a continuing serious loss in the movement of commodities. It is to that subject that I want to devote a few minutes of my time. It is my intention to discuss frankly the effect of this rail tie-up on the movement of grain and commodities in the Midwest.

At my request, Ralph Clark of the Association of American Railroads, has supplied me with figures on the receipts of empty boxcars by western roads from eastern and southern connections. These daily reports show the effect of the first strike, which began December 13, 1950, and ended 3 days later. On December 13, 652 cars were delivered to midwestern roads through Chicago, St. Louis, Peoria, and Memphis.

On the 14th, the second day of the strike, 374 cars were delivered, and on that 8-day week end an average of 253 cars were delivered. On the second week end following the strike, December 22 to 25, an average of 362 cars were delivered. On the third week end, December 29 to 31, an average of 557 cars were delivered. I am using these figures to prove the point that even though the strike is over, it takes weeks before the movement of cars gets back to normal.

The daily average movement of cars to the midwestern railroads through regular points for November 1950, was 929. For December, 550, and for January, 838. These average daily movements show that even after 50 days following the end of the first strike, railroad movement of cars to that area had not reached the average of the month preceding the strike.

The present strike, which has not yet ended, has lasted 10 days instead of 3 days, which was the length of the December strike. It is reasonable to assume that it will be late spring before the movement of these badly needed cars will be back to normal operation.

Another factor entering into the movement of cars is, of course, the extreme cold winter through which we are going. This again affects the movement of rail transportation.

My office has received literally hundreds of requests from Kansas grain dealers and shippers for cars during the past few weeks. Typical of these telegrams is the following from the Dean Grain Co., of Agra, Kans.:

AGRA, KANS., January 23.

Senator CARLSON: Reference item Topeka Daily Capital issue January 20 advising you from Wichita grain box car supply showing improvement. Missouri Pacific branch railways serving south of here have been receiving more cars possible reason for this favorable report from that receiving station. However, certainly does not apply this and surrounding Rock Island railway stations as grain car situation has been getting worse past 30 days. We have 160,000 bushels grain here in store. Sixty thousand bushels of it bought and sold waiting cars for shipment the past 30 days and have had standing order since first of the year for 30 box cars to move it. We only been furnished four grain cars since first of the year. Our elevators here have been blocked for 2 weeks and grain piled on ground. Elevators at Kirwin 6 miles south of here on Missouri Pacific received eight cars one day last week and elevator manager advised us did not have sufficient grain to load all of them as both Missouri Pacific branch railways south of here have been receiving sufficient box cars to keep open and operating for the past 30 days. Please investitgate and advise why this so poorly managed and unequal distribution of the box cars that are available for grain loading.

DEAN GRAIN CO.
C. H. DEAN.

My office has had the finest of cooperation from the Association of American Railroads and the officials of the railroads operating in this area, yet the situation was very serious and now it is critical.

On February 1, 1951, there were 1,298 elevators blocked in the grain area, and of this number 170 were in Kansas. It is very unusual to have elevators blocked in January. Normally this situation prevails in June during the harvest month.

The stocks of grain in the grain area on January 1, 1951, were greatly in excess of the same period in 1950. On January 1 this year in Kansas we had 174,461,000 bushels of wheat in all positions, and on that same date in 1950 we had 158,904,000 bushels.

Holdings of all grains in Kansas on January 1, 1951, were 207,554,000 bushels, compared with 178,701,000 bushels in 1950.

I hesitate to think of the serious delay and the actual loss in the movement of this grain, not only in Kansas, but in the entire Midwest.

This loss and difficulty must be charged to those who are responsible for the operation of the railroad transportation system.

I had intended to discuss only the loss to grain producers and grain dealers, but this morning I received a telegram which I think should be brought to the attention of the Senate. It is from the Berrys Hatchery, of Atchison, Kans., and Newton, Kans., is dated February 7, 1951, and reads:

One hundred thousand baby chicks hatched today are homeless and must be destroyed because cannot ship to customers account rail strike. Have destroyed thousands baby chicks in past week. We have half a million chicks hatching within week, all sold for delivery to broiler plants and egg farmers throughout United States that cannot be delivered and must be destroyed unless rail strike is settled. Over 200,000 chicks in brooders on orders to hundreds of farmers that must be shipped at once or will lose them. Situation very critical and will mean bankruptcy to thousands of hatcheries throughout country and loss of millions of pounds of food next summer and winter unless positive action is taken at once. Domination of entire business economy by a few men is disastrous to American principles and way of life. Urge immediate action to prevent further losses to industry and to future food production

BERRYS HATCHERY,
GEORGE BERRY,
ERNEST BERRY.

NEWTON, KANS.

No doubt this same situation prevailed in many sections of the Nation, and the loss referred to is a loss which cannot be justified at a time when the Nation needs full production to prevent inflation, and for badly needed food.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARLSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. THYE. I was very much impressed by the able remarks of the Senator from Kansas relative to baby chicks. A baby chick does not have much value from the standpoint of food. However, if an individual hatcher must destroy thousands of baby chicks, it may well amount to his ruin. Give a baby chick a few weeks, and it is a broiler or a fryer. Give it a few months, and it is a productive bird. Therefore it is very important to have movement of baby chicks from the hatchery, because if the baby chicks are not moved within a few days after they are hatched, they must be disposed of. I was impressed by the reference to baby chicks and the problems that have resulted from the railroad tie-up.

We in the Northern States have endured one of the most severe winters we have experienced in many a year. Excessive snow has blocked transportation by truck. The excessive cold weather during the past 2 months has depleted our coal reserves. Without boxcars and without adequate railroad transportation, the entire northern area, not only the State of Minnesota, is faced with an emergency. Unless we get coal there will be a great deal of suffering, to say nothing about the loss to our industrial and food-processing plants.

On behalf of the people of the Northwest I thank the Senator from Kansas for his very able speech. By his able presentation the country can see how we are being affected by the present railway tie-up.

Mr. CARLSON. The distinguished Senator from Minnesota is absolutely correct. Next spring, even before the harvest, when the Commodity Credit Corporation grain is needed, as we begin to move, in April and May, we shall really feel the effects of the strike which is taking place in January of this year.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARLSON. I yield gladly.

Mr. LANGER. I may say to my distinguished friend from Kansas that this is an old question. Five years ago, under the Democratic administration, a member of the Republican Party submitted Senate Resolution 185. The distinguished former Senator from Kansas, Clyde Reed, who perhaps knew as much about railroads, railroad freight rates, and boxcar shortages as any man who has sat in the Senate, conducted an investigation. I want to ask my distinguished friend if it is not true that we find incompetency on the part of officeholders in many departments of the Government? For illustration, this morning

I showed that a small manufacturer of spark plugs filed a complaint in 1937, 13 years ago, and up to now no decision has been rendered in the case. When I heard about it on the fourth day of December, 20 small firms had gone into bankruptcy. Three great big outfits control the field. Eventually a decision will be rendered, I presume.

With respect to the antitrust statutes, there is not a Senator, including my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], who is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, who does not know of the laxity in the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Mr. FERGUSON. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. LANGER. During all these years not one person has been put in jail for violation of those laws. Our officials are sworn to uphold the law. A farm organization in my State brought an action before a Government Commission, and it took 6 years to get a decision.

Mr. President, justice delayed is no justice at all.

The distinguished Senator from Kansas is speaking on this very important subject today. Where is the fault? A moment ago the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] mentioned the fact that the Commodity Credit Corporation did not get its wheat out, but left it in the elevators, as the distinguished Senator from Minnesota has said, until about the time the new crop comes in. The elevators are blocked all over the Northwest, and it is necessary to pile up the wheat and the flax.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, it was the able Senator from Kansas who referred to the blockade of grain in the elevators. I want to give credit to the able Senator from Kansas, because he was the one who brought out that thought and made it known to us.

Mr. CARLSON. I appreciate the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. LANGER. What happened? It was brought out at the last hearing, 3 months ago, that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. had only 6 or 7 percent of its cars there. It was shown that we manufactured 34,000 cars for England, 4,000 cars for Mexico, and 4,000 cars for the Argentine. No cars were manufactured for us at all. Today, when inquiry is made, as I am sure my friend from Kansas has made inquiry, it will be said, "Oh, we are manufacturing 100,000 cars now, or 120,000 cars, or 150,000 cars." I submit that under the present administration the farmer has been completely neglected so far as concerns the transportation of products which he raises. He is suffering a loss, as my distinguished friend from Kansas knows only too well. We know that instead of being able to store his grain, the farmer has had to haul it to the elevator and take the best cash price he could get. That is the situation all over North Dakota.

I compliment my distinguished colleague and friend, the former Governor of Kansas. He is intimately acquainted with the situation. I compliment him for presenting the facts. I hope that, following the lead of the distinguished former Senator from Kansas, Clyde Reed, he will keep right on, with a few others of us from the Northwest, until we get justice for the farmers. I finish my question by asking whether or not he is not going to do it.

Mr. CARLSON. I am indebted to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota for his comment on this important subject. I appreciate what he has said in behalf of the distinguished late senior Senator from Kansas, Clyde M. Reed, whom I have the honor to succeed. He was an outstanding authority on freight rates, and was recognized as such not only in Kansas but in the Nation. If I could only approach in a small way his knowledge on this subject, I should be very happy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a table showing some of the figures on the movement of cars, together with a statement showing the chronology of the conductors' and trainmen's wage dispute.

There being no objection, the table and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHRONOLOGY OF CONDUCTORS' AND TRAINMEN'S WAGE DISPUTE

March 15, 1949: Submitted proposals to amend existing agreements to provide 5-day 40-hour workweek for yard employees without reduction in pay, time and one-half for Sundays and holidays. Graduating rate of pay for conductors and trainmen according to weight on drivers of locomotives being used. Modification of other operating and pay rules.

April 1949: Conclusion of initial conferences on individual railroads, under procedural machinery of Railway Labor Act. Railroads authorized three regional committees to participate in concerted handling with union's committees.

September 22, 1949: National conferences began.

December 14, 1949: National conferences terminated.

December 15, 1949: Railroad invoke services of National Mediation Board.

January 16, 1950: Mediation commenced.

February 14, 1950: Arbitration proffered. Railroads agreed to submit dispute to arbitration, but conductors and trainmen rejected arbitration.

February 17, 1950: Announcement by unions that strike date had been set for 6 a. m., February 27, 1950.

February 24, 1950: President of United States created Emergency Board to investigate dispute; comprising members were Justice Roger I. McDonough, chairman; Judge Mart J. O'Malley; Prof. Gordon S. Watkins.

March 2–May 9, 1950: Hearings of Emergency Board.

June 15, 1950: Emergency Board recommended: (1) A 5-day 40-hour workweek for yard employees with increase in basic rates of 18 cents per hour, to become effective October 1, 1950. (2) That in lieu of daily earnings minimum guaranty, rates of pay of yard employees be increased 2½ cents per hour. (3) That carriers be given right to lift restrictions on interdivisional runs; pooling of cabooses should be permitted; and certain other rules changed.

June 20, 1950: Parties met in Chicago to discuss recommendations of Board.

June 22, 1950: Carriers wired acceptance of Board's recommendations, but unions assailed report.

June 27, 1950: Mediation Board again met with parties, conference continuing through July 8, then recessed to convene at Washington on July 17.

July 11, 1950: Unions wired President of United States that Board's recommendations were rejected and that they would use every power at our command to bring about a just and satisfactory settlement.

July 17–August 15, 1950: Mediation between parties continued in Washington with Dr. Steelman participating from August 7.

August 4, 1950: Unions requested President to seize railroads.

August 16, 1950: Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen called 5-day strike of yardmen at three terminals, strike to be effective from August 21.

August 17, 1950: Unions called 5-day strike of trainmen and yardmen on two railroads from August 22.

August 19, 1950: Dr. Steelman suggested a settlement. (1) The Board's recommendations. (2) A 3-year peace settlement, including, for yardmen, an additional 5 cents an hour and an automatic quarterly wage adjustment of 1 cent an hour for each 1-point increase in cost of living. (3) An increase of 5 cents an hour for road men instead of no increase as recommended by the Board, with cost-of-living adjustment. The railroads agreed to Dr. Steelman's proposals, but the unions rejected them.

August 23, 1950: Unions called Nationwide strike for August 28.

August 25, 1950: President of the United States provided for Government seizure of railroads, and their operation by the Secretary of the Army from August 27.

September 6, 1950: At suggestion of Dr. Steelman, Mediation Board again conferred with parties.

October 1950: Trainmen's convention at Miami, Fla.; no negotiations between parties under auspices of Mediation Board held.

November 20, 1950: Negotiations renewed at White House with Dr. Steelman.

December 11, 1950: Wildcat strikes in certain large yards; temporary restraining orders were secured by the Government in three locations.

December 15, 1950: President of the United States termed strikes unlawful and said yardmen should return to work. Employees did return to work on or about December 16. Joint conferences between the parties continued at the White House.

December 21, 1950: Memorandum of agreement was signed at the White House which provided: (1) A 40-hour week for yardmen, the actual effecting of which was postponed until January 1, 1952. (2) A 23-cents-per-hour wage increase to yardmen, retroactive to October 1, 1950. (3) A 2-cent wage increase to yardmen, effective from January 1, 1951. (4) A 4-cent wage increase to yardmen, if and when the 4-hour week becomes effective. (5) A 5-cent wage increase to road men from October 1, 1950. (6) A 5-cent wage increase to road men from January 1, 1951. (7) A quarterly adjustment of wages, 1 cent for each 1-point rise in cost of living for both yard and road men. First adjustment to be made April 1, 1951. (8) Establish rules recommended by Board. (9) In consideration of above, agreement to be effective until October 1, 1953.

January 7, 1951: General Chairman of Conductors' Organization reject settlement of December 21, 1950.

January 18, 1951: Unions again conferred with Dr. Steelman, who in turn referred them to the National Mediation Board.

January 30, 1951: Wild-cat strikes began at various large centers.

February 8, 1951: Most operating men back at work.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARLSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I was called out of the chamber while the Senator was speaking, so he may have referred to it, but has not the difficulty in the rail situation arisen from the refusal in recent years to abide by the findings of the Railway Labor Board, and from political appeals to the White House, which enabled politicians to accord what they believed to be political consideration for political advantage? Now the men feel that they can go a step further. It was the practice of both the present and preceding President to attempt to settle these matters by political means rather than by arbitration.

Mr. CARLSON. I am in thorough accord with the statement of the Senator from Maine. Before he entered the Chamber I stated that the President was directly responsible for the mishandling of this strike. It should have been taken care of immediately. I mentioned the fact that the governors of nine Midwestern States took hold of the Missouri Pacific strike, and that an agreement was reached. The same thing could have been done in Washington.

UNITED STATES VERSUS WILLIAM REMINGTON

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, last evening a jury in a Federal court in the city of New York decided a very important case. It was the case of the People of the United States against William Remington. The jury in that case decided that Remington had lied when he had denied ever having been a member of the Communist Party. That case and its decision were significant for a number of reasons.

In the first place it established as a legal principle that to be a member of the Communist Party in the United States, and a part of its apparatus, one does not have to be a card-carrying member of the party. In other words, the decision recognizes the underground nature of Communist operations. This is highly important as evidence of a realistic view of the nature of the Communist conspiracy.

The case was also highly important for its very nature. It again focuses attention on the fact that in recent months we have found the only method which has been effectively pursued by the executive branch of the Government in relation to disloyalty has been trials for perjury. I cite the case of Alger Hiss, and now the case of Remington, as well as the case of Carl Marzani. The reason is this: The Congress of the United States has been very active against disloyal persons. Believing that the security of the United States was involved, the Congress has made certain investigations on the question of loyalty and subversion. It has brought to light certain facts which would otherwise have been buried. Once brought to light public opinion dictated that there should be prosecutions, and perjury charges have been the means of bringing to justice these people in Government whose disloyal activities were exposed by the Congress.

When the jury in the Alger Hiss case came in it convicted Mr. Hiss and acquitted the Un-American Activities Committee of the House. When the jury came in last night and the jury foreman said, "We find the defendant guilty as charged," that jury convicted Mr. Remington of perjury and acquitted the United States Senate. It will be recalled that in 1948 Mr. Remington was the subject of an investigation by a Senate subcommittee of which the Senator from Michigan was then chairman.

At the time the Senator from Michigan was seeking to bring out the facts in relation to Mr. Remington the Senate was subjected to severe criticism. The President of the United States said, in connection with those same hearings, "That is nothing but a 'red herring'." But, Mr. President, a jury in Federal court last night found that it was not just a "red herring," but that it was a serious matter of vast implications and deep meaning.

The fact that these cases have been successfully prosecuted as perjury cases leads one to ask why the job cannot be done as well behind the cloak of secrecy—and I am talking about the Government's loyalty program—with which the executive department surrounds itself in such matters. Why cannot the same job be done by the Government within its own household as can be done out in the open, in a trial before the Federal court.

I ask this question: Is perjury more damaging to the public interest than disloyalty? I repeat the question for emphasis: Is perjury more damaging to the public interest than disloyalty?

Loyalty hearings are star-chamber proceedings. But unlike the original star chamber the secrecy operates for the benefit of the accused, and they do not bring out all the evidence. But when it comes to a court case, after a grand jury has indicted an individual for perjury, the FBI is called upon to dig up the evidence, and it produces it as demonstrated by the Hiss and Remington trials. Why cannot the same FBI be asked by the Loyalty Board to obtain evidence? The reason is that one proceeding is held in secret, and the other is in public. Exposed to the light of public scrutiny in open court, the Government has no alternative but to employ its best prosecutive talents.

Mr. President, it is an amazing thing that there were placed in evidence in the New York trial of Remington statements from the files of the Civil Service Commission, which has charge of the Loyalty Board, which were never even used before the Loyalty Board when it had the Remington case before it.

The Loyalty Board, as you know, cleared Remington after the Senate subcommittee had first brought his case to light. I say that decision of the Loyalty Board in the Remington case rendered a great disservice to the public interest and the United States. It retained in Government employment a person who, under the findings of the New York jury, could not possibly be considered as anything but a grave security risk. We had adduced concrete evidence that he was delivering classified Government data to an admitted courier for a Communist spy ring. It is more than irony, because it was a travesty of justice, that the Loyalty Board decision permitted William Remington to sue that courier for libel in the civil courts, and by reason of its decision to obtain damages, although I must say that the settlement was not made willingly by the courier who had known she was telling the truth. The Board's decision allowed William Remington to obtain back pay from the Government of the United States for the period of his suspension while under investigation, and to go back on the payroll and work for the Government. I say all that is a clear consequence of trying to do things by executive decree, instead of trying to do them under the law.

The decision of the jury has cleared the Senate of all discredit heaped upon it following the Remington hearings in 1948. I recall not only the President's cry of "red herring" while the Remington hearings were in progress, but a bitterly clever piece of abuse heaped on the Senate subcommittee in the magazine New Yorker. That magazine painted a picture of injured innocence in a "profile" of William Remington. I wonder if now the magazine New Yorker will want to supplement its account of that case with a more up-to-date "profile" on Mr. Remington, its picture of injured innocence.

The Senate was halted in its investigation of the Remington case by the refusal of the President to produce pertinent documents. In effect the matter was left to the Loyalty Board, however unwillingly. The full circumstances under which the Senate committee was forced to abandon its pursuit of the Remington case were set forth in a report which the Senator from Michigan filed June 19, 1948.

I wish to read what we said in the report, which is Senate Report No. 1775 of the Eightieth Congress. I read from page 20:

> The request of the Executive Departments for information in the Remington case is a reasonable request. If the executive branch persists in its present policy of refusing to grant that request, the true facts cannot be learned by the subcommittee or the public. Both are entitled to the facts.

Mr. President, it was impossible for us to secure all the facts for the public's benefit. For instance, an admiral in the United States Navy came before us and gave us highly incriminating facts about Remington, off the record. But when he was formally summoned to testify as a witness under oath, he said that he had orders, direct from the President of the United States, that he could not give the committee or the public the facts concerning Mr. Remington.

The folly of the Loyalty Board's clearance of Remington, after Congress had pointed the finger at him and carried its charges as far as possible, is now shown by the decision of a jury of the United States court. This points directly to the weaknesses of the present loyalty program.

The startling fact is that under existing interpretations of the Loyalty Board's functions, Remington could return to the Federal employment tomorrow, so far as the Board is concerned. A jury has found that he committed perjury when he said to the grand jury that he had never been a Communist. Yet under the interpretation by the Loyalty Board of the Executive order under which it functions, William Remington could tomorrow return to the employ of the United States, if he were otherwise free to do so. I understand the judge last night sent him to a detaining point where he would not be able to offer his services in voluntary Federal employment.

Mr. President, I ask this question: What then is wrong with the loyalty program? Basically its very name is deceptive, and its present existence does no more than deceive the public.

Its only justification is as a security program. Why be concerned with disloyalty except for security reasons? Yet in practice it is only remotely a security program when it ties itself to the vague meanings of loyalty. Consequently it has dangerously lulled the public into a false sense of security. This so-called loyalty program has been palmed off on the public and has been accepted as a security program, but it simply is not that. Right now, as in the past years, we need a security program. We need one desperately. And we need a new one, as is clearly shown by the Remington case.

The Loyalty Board which is the final authority in the loyalty program claims it has been tied down by the terms of the Executive order under which it is constituted. If so, it has been tied down by a strained interpretation of its own directive, which interpretation requires (a) that disloyalty—as against the question of security risk—must be proved; and (b) that the proof must be of the instant, that is the individual now, at the time of the hearing, must be proved disloyal. Evidence of past disloyalty, in other words, is not to be permitted to color the decision as to present loyalty. This is to say that if yesterday I was known and proved to be a card-carrying Communist, but today that same evidence of disloyalty could not be produced, I would be cleared of any charges of disloyalty as affecting my fitness for Government service. I submit that simply offends common sense and good judgment. But it is the present basis of operations for the Loyalty Board.

Let me read from the Executive order which constitutes the Loyalty Board, the part which gives rise to that construction. It is Executive Order 9835, dated March 21, 1947, and I read from part V, on "Standards":

> The standard for the refusal of employment or the removal from employment in an executive department or agency on grounds relating to disloyalty shall be that, on all the evidence, reasonable grounds exist for a belief that the person involved is disloyal—

And I want to underscore the words "is disloyal"— > to the Government of the United States.

Prior to that particular Executive order there was in effect another War Service Regulation, dated February 28, 1942. From part 2, section 3, I read as follows:

> An applicant may be denied examination and an eligible may be denied appointment for * * * (g) "a reasonable doubt as to his loyalty to the Government of the United States".

This is one of the reasons which were "sufficient cause for removal from the service" prior to the operations of the present Loyalty Board, but the standards stated therein have since been changed.

Mr. President, an order was issued in February, 1942. In March, 1947, a new order was issued upon creation of the new loyalty program. The Loyalty Board says that under its interpretation of the changed directive, it cannot do the same things under the new order that were possible under the old wartime order.

The fact is, Mr. President, that the Loyalty Board has surrounded itself or been surrounded with restrictions and limitations so that it cannot function in the public interest. The consequence has been that the Board has recognized all the Commie lines of imaginary rights, such as the "right" not to be accused and the "right" of freedom from guilt by association.

Mr. President, before these Commie line "rights" were brought out the basic rights in the Constitution and under the law of the United States were sufficient. The Commie rights are just phony baloney rights, and there is nothing in our system which says they should ever have been recognized by the Loyalty Board when it was charged with trying to preserve the security of the United States of America.

While the two Executive orders are apparently similar in purpose, the effect of their interpretations are miles apart. It follows from the interpretation of the present Executive order that the conviction of Remington would not bar him from present employment in the Government. That conviction, despite the volumes it tells about the man does not prove that he is now disloyal, I emphasize the words "is now disloyal" because they are the key words in the interpretation of the Loyalty Board's directive.

Mr. President, I cannot avoid the conclusion that the President, in issuing the new Executive order in 1947, deliberately and intentionally changed the wording of the 1942 order so that the present interpretation might be had. By doing so he has sought to close forever the book that contains the records of the Communists and the fellow travelers in the Government of the United States of America.

If that interpretation by the Loyalty Board is allowed to stand, it will freeze in the Government service, and will conceal them there, all persons who in the past have been disloyal to the Government. It will protect them from the discipline and the policing of public opinion.

In such case, all that disloyal Government employees will have to do will be to conceal their present disloyal activities, because their past, by this interpretation, is said to be of no concern to the Government and the public. Of course, Mr. President, such persons have had sufficient warning, and have gone underground. Why would not they conceal their present activities? I say that unless we can open the books of the past activities of Communists and fellow travelers in the employ of the Government of the United States, we shall never be able to get at them.

Are we going to be so naive as to believe that the Soviet Union, with its spies all over the world, in all other countries, has not attempted to have them penetrate the departments of the Government of the United States of America? Do we not know, from the Hiss case and the Remington case, that the Soviet has had its spy rings in this country and in our Government? Mr. President, the job for the United States to do is to ferret out those spies, and get them out of our Government.

The United States must recognize that the first and the greatest weapon used by the Soviet Union in its conspiracy to take over all the world is the penetration by its spies of the other nations and their governments. If the Soviet Union is unable to succeed in doing that, it will use its satellite armies, as it has done in Korea. There is every reason to believe that if the Soviet Union is unable to succeed by means of either its first method or its second method, it will use the Red Army. That is a pattern of strategy against which we must defend ourselves.

So, Mr. President, I again say that we should anticipate Communists and fellow travelers are in the departments and agencies of the Government of the United States. Our job is to ferret them out, not to permit them to be protected by means of an Executive order which will freeze them in the Government of the United States and will conceal them there.

Mr. President, if this interpretation of the present Board's function is correct, then the past activities of a person in the Government service will be permitted to throw no light at all on his present intentions or his present integrity for public trust. Under present circumstances, the Board will only ask, in regard to such a person, "Is it proved that he is now disloyal?" The Board will not ask, "Was he once disloyal, and if so, does that have a bearing on his present loyalty and fitness for public trust."

Mr. President, I have reasons for believing that the present Loyalty Board understands that difficulty and that weakness, is not satisfied with the present condition, and realizes that the present situation is a farce and a phony. I hope something will be done about that matter very soon. However, the time is growing late. I hope the Board will be able to examine the past activities of Government employees. We have been reminded that a Chinese philosopher once said that it is well to study the past, in order to be able to anticipate what will occur in the future.

Mr. President, one result of the limitation now imposed as a result of the order and its interpretation, namely, that it is necessary to prove that such a person is now disloyal, has been that 60 percent of the regional Loyalty Board cases, in regard to findings of disloyalty, have been overturned. Apparently the regional boards have not strained at the interpretation which governs the parent board.

Mr. President, the Board also is weak because in practice it does not seek all available evidence. It is not even empowered to do so by means of subpoena. Just think of that, Mr. President. The Board is created to ferret out those insidious persons who have been placed by the Communist Party in our Government service, but the Board cannot make use of the power of subpoena in order to obtain evidence against such persons.

Recently a new executive commission to inquire into all phases of subversion was appointed. But it, too, is without the power of subpoena. How far will that Board be able to go? How far will it be able to do a proper job? Do we wish to have a proper job done? If we do, why do not we take all possible steps to make sure that a proper job will be done, instead of reposing trust in executive decrees, not laws? It is the idea that decrees will solve the problem that makes it impossible for a proper job to be done, because the decrees must emanate from those who have vested interest in the errors of the past. In order to insure that a proper job will be done, we must see to it, among other things, that any agency handling such matters will have the power of subpoena, so that it may obtain the evidence it needs, and so that the persons who testify before it will be required to tell the truth, under threat of punishment for committing perjury.

Mr. President, the net effect of the loyalty program's operations has been to cloak all the security weaknesses of the executive branch of our Government. That cloak or cover has been maintained by means of the absolute refusal of the executive branch to disclose the details of its internal operations to the inquiries of Congress, so that security procedures may be strengthened.

The standards of disclosure are those which have been formulated and adopted by the executive branch of our Government itself. The executive branch claims that the standards which have been adopted are based on the national interest. However, that claim boils down to an apparent belief that the national interest would suffer from revelations of internal weakness and administrative error in the executive branch of our Government.

Mr. President, that conclusion on the attitude of the executive branch is borne out by a spectacle enacted just last week. The Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, when dealing with export controls, wished to examine the minutes of the export control and advisory committees which acted as advisers to the Secretary of Commerce. The Senate committee wished to make inquiry regarding the shipment of cotton to China after the beginning of the Korean War. However, the executive branch of the Government would not permit the committee to obtain those minutes; it was claimed that to do so would adversely affect the security of the Government and of the Nation. When the matter was pressed, a statement was made that to permit the committee to examine the minutes would have an adverse affect on the best interests of the United States. Why, Mr. President? Because the minutes of the advisory committee were in terrible shape, and it was thus claimed by the executive branch that exposure of the inefficiency of the advisory committee would be harmful to the security of the United States. Mr. President, I ask the American people if that is good reason for keeping such minutes secret. That case is the most recent in a long series of similar refusals by the executive branch to cooperate in the inquiries of Congress.

Incidentally, that case is also very interesting because of its relationship to the Remington case. At the time Remington was before the committee—and at that time the committee inquiry was pronounced "a red herring"—he was secretary of the ad hoc committee of the Office of International Trade, the identical agency that is responsible for permitting the shipment of cotton to China after the beginning of the Korean War. Just as we were blocked in 1948 from gathering further evidence on Remington, the executive branch of the Government today does not wish any evidence on why such shipments were made to come to the knowledge of the public.

Mr. President, what we need is a security program. The present so-called loyalty program does not provide that.

A high Government agency, I understand, has been working for the past year to set up some kind of a genuine security program. Late as is that effort, it is commendable. But the fact is that not a thing has been done about it. Why? When we see the interpretation of this order freezing the past activities of Government employees, and not allowing such activities to be inquired into as a means of determining the wise course for us to pursue in the future, we can see why nothing has been accomplished by that agency, even though it has been working for a year in its endeavor to obtain a security program.

Next, Mr. President, this matter involves the necessity for a set of sound, practical security standards. As a working basis, I suggest a study and consideration of the report on the Remington case which I have cited. I wish to read one paragraph from that report, and then I shall ask unanimous consent that the remaining portions which I have marked, on pages 2 and 3 of the report, be printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

Let me read this part at this time:

> No person has a right to work for the Government. Working for the Government of the United States is a privilege which should be extended only to those in whom the greatest trust may be imposed. This distinction between a right and a privilege is a most important one in the consideration of a program to guarantee the loyalty of Government employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Michigan?

There being no objection, the portions of the report referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> In our zeal to rid the Government of subversives we must constantly be alert to protect individual rights. While fighting to preserve our democracy we must not forget to practice democracy. The subcommittee desires to stress how important it is that all of our constitutional safeguards remain inviolate. We must be mindful, however, that Communists clamor loudest about constitutional guaranties in their efforts to undermine our democracy. For this reason we must think clearly to avoid the confusion which the Communists hope to create. Arguments about constitutional guaranties should be analyzed to see if they apply to the facts at hand.
> No person has a right to work for the Government. Working for the Government of the United States is a privilege which should be extended only to those in whom the greatest trust may be imposed. This distinction between a right and a privilege is a most important one in the consideration of a program to guarantee the loyalty of Government employees.
> Freedom of speech, freedom of political belief, freedom of assembly, and the right not to be forced to testify against oneself, are basic rights guaranteed to all our people by the Constitution. However, we must not be confused as to the extent of these rights. Let us consider three cases by way of illustration: (1) Today a person in our country has a right to be a Communist and to speak out in behalf of communism if he violates no law such as espionage or conspiracy. By so doing, however, he forfeits any privilege he may have had to work for the United States Government. Surely no one can seriously claim that a person dedicated to overthrowing our form of government is entitled to the privilege of working for that government; (2) in a criminal case a man has a right to a trial by jury and can force the Government to prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt based on testimony other than his own. He cannot be convicted on suspicion. However, a man may forfeit his privilege to work for the Government by constant association with known subversive elements. All Communists are potential espionage agents, and a Federal employee who constantly associates with persons of that ilk forfeits his privilege to work for the Government just as a man may forfeit his privilege to work as cashier of a bank if he constantly associates with known thieves; (3) under our Constitution a person has a right at any time to refuse to answer any question as to his conduct if by answering he would incriminate himself. If he is a Federal employee and he refuses to answer questions as to his loyalty, obviously he forfeits any privilege he has to continue working for the Government. It is analogous to the case of a cashier who, when questioned as to a shortage in his books, refuses to answer on the ground that his answers would tend to show that he is guilty of a crime. In refusing he has exercised a right guaranteed by the Constitution. But when the president of the company revokes the privilege of the cashier to work for the company by firing him he, too, has exercised his right under a free government. Certainly our Government must exercise at least as much care as the operator of a private business in employing persons it can trust.

Our Government, then, should guarantee the rights of all its citizens and should be zealous to prevent any diminution of these rights. On the other hand, it should be equally as vigilant to see that the privileges of citizenship are not abused by the very persons who seek to destroy all rights and privileges.

Stated in terms of loyalty, the program of our Government should have this aim. Communists and other subversives, their sympathizers, and their intimates should be forced out of Government and kept out of Government. Considering the insidious cunning and deceit of a Communist, any reasonable doubt as to the loyalty of a person should be resolved in favor of the Government. There are a sufficient number of persons whose loyalty is above question that self-interest alone should demand that the Government not employ persons of doubtful loyalty. To date this aim has not been accomplished.

Mr. FERGUSON. Third, we need a real determination to put into effect a genuine security program. No program will be successful without that determination. But to assist such a program I suggest the adoption of genuine security tests as the standard of Government employment; instead of vague loyalty standards hampered by requirements of current positive proof. This can be accomplished by adopting the principle that Government employment is a privilege and not a right.

I also submit that any loyalty board must operate on the basis of the right of subpoena, and it should exercise it. Further, it should require that the FBI and the other agencies that can look up evidence for them shall get all the evidence, instead of the Board's taking what is handed them on a platter by an interested board of the particular department, more often than not composed of the personnel employing these particular people.

Fourth, we need a policy of disclosure in the executive branch, so that the public may have the facts, and, on the basis of the facts, may be assured that security risks and subversives are not operating within the walls of the Government and within the Government agencies.

Mr. President, this is a matter which touches the roots of our existence. America is not only in a hot war, but is very much in a cold war. Our men are dying, and we prepare, through the appropriation of billions of dollars—and we are asking $70,000,000,000—to save our material wealth and our lives. But what are we doing to save the internal structure and the ideals which are America? If, through internal penetration and subversion, we lose this structure and the ideals that we have, the walls of this Chamber will be but stones. It is a matter of what the principles stand for inside—of what we stand for on principle, inside. It is a matter of ideals. It is the recognition of the inalienable rights of the people, of government by consent of the governed. Those are the things concerned in the prevention of a conspiracy to overthrow that which is sacred to all of us.

Are we, or are we not, going to do the necessary job of internal defense? That is the question. The jury in the case of the people versus Remington has told us how little we have done in that first line of defense in the recent past.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. Is the distinguished Senator from Michigan aware of the fact that a Thomas Blaisdell, Assistant Secretary of the Department of Commerce, defended Remington, Michael Lee, and several other characters of that ilk, who have later been either convicted or fired from their jobs?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes, I am familiar with that.

Mr. MALONE. Does the Senator know where Mr. Blaisdell is at this time, after having resigned from the Department of Commerce? The Senator probably suspects that we are gathering evidence from him.

Mr. FERGUSON. I saw in the press that he was employed as a professor; I think, as a professor of political science, in a university; which I think was in the State of California.

Mr. MALONE. The University of California. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, Mr. Blaisdell is, I am advised, adviser on international relations; which, of course, enables him to continue his work in the great State of California.

If the Senator will yield further, I should like to ask whether he is familiar with the work of Mr. Gladieux who, I believe, was assistant to the Secretary of Commerce, and whether he knows where Mr. Gladieux is now?

Mr. FERGUSON. The name does not strike a responsive chord. I am afraid I am not familiar with it.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. Gladieux resigned, because there was a direct connection with Communists, apparently; at least we thought there was, and we are still working on it—and he is now with the Ford Foundation, I am informed. These men continue their work, even after they become disconnected with the Government.

I should like to ask the Senator, again, whether he is familiar with the resolution, S. Res. 230, introduced by the junior Senator from Nevada, following disclosures by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, and whether he is familiar with the discharge of Mr. Remington and Mr. Michael Lee, following an investigation conducted by the Commerce Committee. The junior Senator from Nevada had offered a resolution on the floor of the Senate and asked that a committee be appointed to investigate the loyalty and general work of employees of the Department of Commerce.

Following all those disclosures, and the firing of these two characters, one—Remington—quit immediately, but Mr. Lee hung on. He, at first, had been held to be not actually disloyal. This was prior to the time of the hearing conducted by the Commerce Committee. But he was held to be a dangerous security risk. The junior Senator from Nevada was aware of that when he was questioning him. But Lee refused to resign. Remington resigned, after Mr. Sawyer fired him. He was almost immediately indicted, and now, as the distinguished Senator has outlined so ably, he has been convicted.

Is the distinguished Senator from Michigan aware that before Secretary Sawyer finally fired Mr. Lee he cleared him of any charges of disloyalty, despite the fact that he had been found actually disloyal by the Loyalty Board of the Department of Commerce, and therefore, as the distinguished Senator has explained, Mr. Lee could go back to work at his old job, if any Department of Commerce head saw fit to hire him? There is nothing on his record; he has been cleared of all such charges. Is the Senator aware of that?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am only familiar with it from reading the press. Naturally, I did not follow it as closely as did the Senator from Nevada, because he was greatly interested in the Lee case and has followed it.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think it may be well to complete the RECORD regarding Remington. I hold in my hand the latest dispatches which show that Judge Gregory F. Noonan, before whom the case was tried, this afternoon sentenced Mr. William W. Remington to the maximum sentence possible for his crime, namely, 5 years imprisonment and a $2,000 fine. I think it is gratifying that the judge at least has recognized the enormity of this situation.

What interested me was the point made by the Senator from Michigan as to the position Remington had occupied as chairman of the Export Control Board. I should like to call the Senator's attention, in that connection, to the testimony of General Marshall before our committee, that there was an embargo for 10 months on the shipment of the matériel to the Chinese Nationalists; that thereafter the embargo was lifted; but General Marshall said that for 10 months thereafter it proved impractical to resume shipments. Apparently Mr. Remington was a key to the situation. In other words, the downfall of the Nationalists apparently was contributed to in no small measure by the manipulations of this man which were made possible, and our boys are paying the price and the penalty for it today. That is the long reach of the activities of a man who finally, after this long time, stands convicted.

I hold in my hand the record of hearings on the nomination of Thomas C. Blaisdell, Jr., to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce, when some of us, on February 23 and March 22, 1949, seriously questioned Mr. Blaisdell about Mr. Remington, and when Mr. Blaisdell defended Mr. Remington. I have here the statement by Mr. Blaisdell when he was defending Mr. Remington. He said he was a nice fellow, he had known him, and he was all right. I asked Blaisdell whether Remington had not misled him in getting a job. He said he did not think he had; he thought he was all right. So I read now the very question of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] quizzing Mr. Remington in this other hearing, which is found on page 22 of the hearing:

Mr. FERGUSON. Now do I understand today that you want to leave this with the committee, that you in effect misled Blaisdell on not having knowledge of certain facts, that you stated it in such a way as to conceal certain facts?

Mr. Remington—and I think this does him some credit—admitted to me as follows:

I now believe that I misled him.

The thing that intrigues me is that, although Remington admitted to the Senator from Michigan that he had testified that his superior, Mr. Blaisdell, when he was getting his job, was defending him saying he was just an innocent young boy, yet Remington was considered a suitable man to carry out a tremendous responsibility.

I notice that the Senator from Nevada in his statement of March 1950, when we were still trying to get consideration in the matter, stated that it was not a "red herring." The Senator from Nevada pointed out that when an investigation is made, the investigators will run into some curious phenomena. For instance, Assistant Secretary of Commerce Thomas Blaisdell, a protégé of Henry Wallace, has been defending Michael Lee; he also defended William Remington. Remington, it will be recalled, admitted cooperating with Elizabeth T. Bentley, a confessed Soviet spy.

Blaisdell seems to have had Remington with him in the National Resources Planning Board, the War Production Board, the Naval Intelligence in London, and the Department of Commerce. I now understand that Remington is back in the Commerce Department, but supposedly carefully kept away from the "sensitive" jobs.

I admit, as the Senator from Michigan has pointed out, that we receive a little more cooperation from the executive departments than we get from the top. The Secretary of Commerce was before us, and he testified that he had not been informed about it. He said, "I did not know of this." He was asked, "Who is responsible for not knowing about it? Now that you know about it, what are you going to do?"

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I pointed out that it is absolutely true that after Congress gets the grand jury to recognize the facts and to indict a man for perjury in connection with his relation and his activities in the Government, the Department of Justice is able to obtain evidence and get a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt. But think of it: It was possible to convict this man Remington in a court of justice beyond a reasonable doubt—not an imaginary doubt, but a reasonable doubt. Yet he was cleared of disloyalty charges before a mere executive board.

Mr. BREWSTER. And the department for which he worked could find no reason to dismiss him.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Blaisdell resigned from the Department of Commerce a few days before Remington went on trial, knowing, I assume, that he was going to defend him. He probably decided that it was time to get out. We know Lee's record: we know Remington's record. He is a convicted felon. We know the record of Gladieux, who was connected with the Ford Foundation. How much more there is in that case Senators can check——

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. The junior Senator from Nevada pointed out that Mr. Gladieux was Assistant to the Secretary of Commerce, and presumably, though there is no valid proof, because the evidence had not reached the Secretary, according to his statement, it was assumed by everyone that Mr. Gladieux was involved. He claimed to be innocent of the whole thing. Mr. Whitney, if he were so inclined, could blow the lid off a great many of these things.

Mr. BREWSTER. In his resignation I think he made it quite clear that the reasons for quitting were good and sufficient. I refer to Mr. Whitney.

Mr. MALONE. At the time the junior Senator from Nevada made his statement on the floor and asked for a committee to investigate the subject, there must have been someone in the gallery who attended to it—it could not have been done in any other way—for an evening newspaper carried the usual denial and stated that he had been cleared of the charges.

Mr. Macy's testimony in the hearings on Senate Resolution 230 on March 28 to April 4, 1950, admitted that he was in error in saying that notwithstanding the junior Senator from Nevada, although he did not disclose it at that moment, had definite information that while Mr. Lee had not been convicted of absolute disloyalty, the recommendation was made that he was a poor security risk. So the junior Senator from Nevada asked that he be sworn as all other witnesses were sworn. If he had stated under oath that he was cleared, we would have had Mr. Macy, and if he had admitted it, we would have had Mr. Lee. It was one or the other.

Mr. FERGUSON. I think the whole question is one of security.

Mr. BREWSTER. And they know it.

Mr. FERGUSON. But they will not apply any rules or regulations to oust persons as being bad security risks. They fix it so that it must be found at the time of the trial that he is a disloyal person.

In other words, he must be actually an espionage agent and disloyal at the moment he is being tried. Under their interpretation, before a person can be ousted it must be shown that at the time of the trial he is disloyal. That is not a security test. Just think of a program being sold to the people as protecting their security under an Executive order reading as this Executive order is now interpreted to read.

If the President of the United States thinks the proper interpretation of his order is not being made, why has he not corrected it? He could do so simply by changing his order, or by removing his Board if he thought its interpretation of his order was not correct.

While the Remington trial was in progress, Arthur Krock wrote an article which I placed in the RECORD showing clearly the basis on which the Loyalty Board interprets its functions and the scope of its authority. Not one thing has been done about it by the President, who has the final responsibility for the loyalty program he initiated.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would the Senator expect that the investigations by committees would be characterized as asinine by those persons in high authority in the executive department?

Mr. FERGUSON. The committees were trying to render a service to the people of the United States. I take it that the words "red herring" and "asinine" are really one and the same. I understand the President did describe a committee report today as being asinine.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. I should like to say that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was kind enough to ask the junior Senator from Nevada to sit with the committee. We asked for the minutes of an executive session of the Loyalty Board in reference to the hearings on Mr. Lee. Mr. Blaisdell said that by order of the President, he had to refuse. All they needed to do, in order to save the time of the Senate and of other agencies which were working on the case, was simply to lay the minutes of the Board before the committee. But, by order of the President, they were withheld.

I should like to read into the RECORD a short paragraph to show the distinguished Senator from Michigan further supporting evidence that he is exactly correct.

Senator BRICKER. That is right—personal characteristics as well as his ability

In other words, had he been examined before he had been hired.

Mr. BLAISDELL. Correct, sir. And a review of this man by the Department, as I say, the Secretary of Commerce himself has found that Mr. Lee, to the best of our knowledge and on the basis of all the information we have been able to secure, is competent, able, and loyal and has done his job properly.

Mr. President, I wish to point out to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that at that moment the Loyalty Board of the Department of Commerce had held this man to be a poor security risk.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator for his comment. I yield the floor.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, it seems that it is almost necessary for a person to have been investigated at least once for treason to his Government, or at least suspected of disloyalty, to be recommended for appointment to high position in the Government.

THE CASE OF HARRY RUSSELL, CITED FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, during the past few days several of my distinguished colleagues have expressed their views concerning the opinion of Judge Letts in the contempt case against Harry Russell, which was decided on Monday, February 5. Harry Russell was a very reluctant witness before the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce. Russell refused to answer a great many questions pertaining very directly to the work of the committee. The Senate had cited Harry Russell for contempt because of his failure to cooperate with the committee, and the office of the United States attorney of the District of Columbia quickly prosecuted the case with vigor. Mr. Fay, the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, presented the case immediately to the grand jury, and Russell was indicted on some sixty-odd counts. The case before Judge Letts was handled on behalf of the Government by William Hitz, assistant district attorney for the District of Columbia, and it was handled very well indeed. The case was fully presented and well argued by Mr. Hitz on behalf of the Government. Mr. Fay has stated that similar cases which are pending before him will go forward. We are very glad to note that he does not feel the decision of Judge Letts is any more than the opinion of one district court judge, and that it is not binding as to the action that should be taken in the other cases.

Judge Letts granted Harry Russell's motion for a judgment of acquittal, and this result is not appealable. If it were appealable, I am satisfied that the Supreme Court would reverse Judge Letts, because in my opinion he extended the rule of the Blau case beyond logical reason. The opinion in the Russell case by Judge Letts, in the judgment of the Senator from Tennessee, merely stands as the opinion of one district court judge. I think the opinion of Judge Letts is clearly in error under all the decisions of the Supreme Court, including the Blau case.

As I have publicly stated, I do not believe that the decision in the Russell case should be considered a precedent which would result in the acquittal of other persons cited for contempt of the Senate or the House of Representatives. Each case, in my opinion, must be judged on its own merits and on the basis of the particular facts involved.

My view is, in part, based upon a reading of certain portions of the court's decision which appear to relate to matters of opinion and observation, as distinguished from an application of principles of law. In this respect, I have in mind the portion of the opinion wherein the court, after referring to the background of the committee, the resolution of the Senate authorizing the committee, and an interim report of the committee, stated that all these matters were pertinent to Harry Russell's state of mind at the time when he refused to testify.

The judge said:

> In all probability, he had in mind the purpose of the investigation and the trend it had taken. He must have had in mind that the committee regarded him as a big shot in interstate gambling activities. He may well have concluded from the initial questions propounded to him that the committee was unfriendly to him and hostile to him. He may have become alarmed at the manner of the committee's approach. Surely that approach was not patterned to put him at ease.
> The court thinks he had reasonable grounds for his apprehension. Certainly this is true if the suspicions entertained by the committee were justified, and the court thinks in all likelihood this defendant knew of the suspicions so entertained by the committee.

In all fairness I do not believe that every judge hearing other contempt cases would find that a resolution of the Senate and an attitude of a Senate committee must be so kind and conciliatory as to put all witnesses at ease.

In investigative hearings a majority of the witnesses appearing before a Senate committee are unfriendly. Is Congress to be deprived of its necessary investigative function because it is unable to put a witness at ease when he appears before a Senate committee? The investigative function is a very vital part of the work of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate. I may say that if this opinion were the law, which I do not think it is, the carrying out of such investigative work by Senate and House committees would be greatly, unfairly, and improperly impeded, because if we must meet the requirement of putting a witness at ease and not show a hostile attitude, then of course we would be prevented from eliciting information from many witnesses. As a matter of fact we know that some of the most valuable information is secured from unfriendly witnesses. If a witness can merely refuse to answer, among other reasons, because the committee does not feel kindly to him, or does not put him at his ease, of course Senate and House committees are at a great disadvantage.

I cannot conceive of the result which the court apparently envisions, namely, that the Senate must divorce itself in the course of the conduct of hearings from any unfriendly thoughts concerning witnesses that might appear before it. Each one of us knows of some witness or other who has appeared before a Senate committee toward whom he could not feel friendly.

As a matter of fact, our committee had every reason to believe on the basis of testimony and of investigation that Harry Russell was intimately connected with the Capone outfit. Furthermore, it appeared that Russell had in some fashion muscled his way into the S. & G. syndicate which controlled bookmaking in the Miami area. With all this knowledge, we tried to give Russell the fairest of hearings. Actually, when Russell first appeared and stated that he had not consulted an attorney as to his rights, we put his hearing over to another day in order to give him the fullest opportunity to consult a lawyer. Nevertheless, when Russell appeared the second time, he appeared without counsel and made no effort to reciprocate the cooperative attitude of our committee.

I wish to point out—and Judge Letts would have done well in my opinion to have at least taken notice of it—that after the hearing was postponed for several days in order to enable Mr. Russell to engage counsel, he stated, on his return that he did not want counsel although he had consulted an attorney, and that the attorney had stated the law and his privileges to him exactly as the chairman of the special committee had done during the previous hearing.

Certainly these facts would show that in Russell's case, as in all other cases, the committee has made every effort to be fair to the witnesses. Of course, the persons whom we ask to testify are very often those whom we suspect of being intimately connected with organized crime in interstate commerce. We do not approach the hearings without some knowledge of the facts and, therefore, we must have suspicions and feelings toward those persons who are the big shots in the criminal world.

Another reason for my view that the Russell decision will not be binding on other cases of contempt and that such cases will have to stand on their own facts and merits is the fact that our courts have created a line of decisions which may be read as permitting many questions of the type that we asked Harry Russell.

I have in mind a line of cases beginning with Mason against United States which was decided by the Supreme Court in 1917. That was a case in which a witness before a Federal grand jury was compelled to state whether he saw a game of cards being played at his own table in Alaska where, under Federal laws, the playing of cards for money was a crime.

Since the Mason case, we have had Camarota against United States decided by the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in 1940. In that case, a witness was required to answer questions relating to the sale of wire service to bookies, even though subsequent answers might incriminate him as to Federal income-tax statutes. Harry Russell was asked many easier questions than those involved in the two cases I have discussed, but in some instances he declined to answer questions relating to whether he knew people or whether he had ever met people, whether during a certain time he had ever been in Miami Beach, whether he had ever consulted a lawyer, and many other questions of that kind. Certainly, such questions would not, nor the answers thereto, incriminate a person under the Federal statutes, for I know of no Federal law which makes it a crime to know a person with a criminal record. Some of the persons about whom we asked him did not have criminal records. I do not know of any crime of which he could have been guilty by reason of having been in a certain place or in a certain section, because certainly a citizen of this country has a right to go anywhere he wishes.

I could go on at this point to cite a great many more cases which have held that questions such as those asked of Harry Russell must be answered. I believe it is unnecessary to do so at this time. However, I did want to take this opportunity to point out that legal precedents exist which might very well be observed in other jurisdictions and by other judges before whom contempt cases are brought.

I might add that the recent Blau case—the Communist case—decided by the Supreme Court does not appear to apply to Harry Russell's case and might not apply in other cases because Harry Russell himself indicated that he did not really fear a Federal prosecution as is shown in his own words when he said to the committee: "I don't think, Senator, that I have committed any crime."

In all these cases the refusal to testify was on the ground that it might incriminate the witness. The refusal must relate to some definite fear, something which is real. It cannot be a mere fantasy or a possibility. Furthermore, under other decisions of the Supreme Court, it cannot be the fear of prosecution under a State law. With respect to many of the questions asked Harry Russell, refusal to answer could be based only upon a fantasy or a fear very far removed from any possibility of the answer incriminating him.

Mr. President, I say that if congressional committees are to have any power at all to obtain information from witnesses, the rule laid down by Judge Letts cannot be a sound rule of law. Certainly if a person has a real fear, and if his answer might really incriminate him in connection with some Federal offense, under the fifth amendment he has the right to decline to answer; and that is as it should be. But to allow a person to refuse to answer merely because he has some faint and fantastic idea that a question might incriminate him or might be a link in a chain which might incriminate him, when he will not even specify the Federal statute or law which he has in mind, would be taking away from congressional committees a very necessary power to compel witnesses to testify in order to obtain information which investigating committees must have.

I wish it understood that I have full respect for our judicial authorities. I never like to make any criticism of any judge's opinion. We all have our own opinions. Various judges have different opinions. However, I felt that I must take this occasion to point out that certain factors which Judge Letts found to be so important in the Russell case would not necessarily appear so important to another judge hearing a case of alleged contempt against the Senate.

I wish also to point out that in my opinion Judge Letts' decision does not follow the decision of the Supreme Court in the Blau case and other decisions of the Supreme Court. In order for a witness to refuse to testify on the basis of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, there must be a real fear that his testimony would incriminate him, and it must be in connection with some Federal statute which he has in mind. He may not refuse to testify merely because the committee is unfriendly to him, or because he has some unreal, remote, fantastic idea that his answer might lead to some chain of events which would incriminate him.

The matter has been fully discussed with members of the special committee. We feel that it is our responsibility to bring to the attention of the Senate recommendations for contempt proceedings against witnesses who refuse to answer questions which we feel are pertinent, when no showing is made that the answers to the questions might incriminate them. We feel that there will be different results before other district judges in the cases which will be presented to them.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. McFARLAND. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, February 12, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Walter B. Pruett, Methodist Church, Carrollton, Ill., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, who art on earth as well as in heaven, we thank Thee for the privilege that is ours of bearing various responsibilities these days. Realizing that we cannot do well enough the deeds that must be done unless we turn to Thee, we pause now to commune with Thee. Grant unto us, we pray, the insight to see clearly the problems that face us and are our responsibility, the wisdom to find the best possible solution for each problem, and the strength and courage we need to do the things we thereby feel to be according to Thy will.

These things we pray as Thy most humble children. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to address the House on Monday and Wednesday next for 30 minutes each day, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may sit today during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

TAXES ON LIQUOR

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an editorial from the New York Mirror.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, in the past few days the Secretary of the Treasury has suggested that additional taxes be levied upon spiritous liquors. We are all cognizant of the necessity of raising revenues in these trying times. However, those who are suggesting that taxes be placed upon items that are already highly taxed seem to forget the law of diminishing returns. The high tax that is now in existence on liquors has been the cause of increased bootlegging. Reports from Secretary Snyder's own Department admit that there is more bootlegging today than at any time since the repeal of prohibition. Wherever a gallon of illicit untaxed liquor is sold, a gallon of licensed legitimate liquor is not sold and the Government loses at least $9.

Some people who should know allege that 20 percent of the liquor that is being consumed in this country today does not pay any Government tax since it is illicitly manufactured. There is no doubt that the illegal liquor is inferior in taste, contents and body, but because of its cheapness can more than compete in certain circles with a licensed product. If we are going to place an additional tax on liquor, you may rest assured that the flood of bootlegging liquor throughout the country will cause a serious loss of income to our Government.

THAT MAN IS HERE AGAIN

G-men and Suffolk County cops made a call Monday on a dilapidated house in a remote section of North Babylon, Long Island, where the United States Government lost $1,795,500.

Uncle Sam took that rap in uncollected taxes. The State of New York was also a loser, to the amount of $157,500.

Not to keep you in suspense, the raided house contained a 500-gallon-a-day still, which had been happily cooking up 190-proof whisky for a period of 7 months.

Well, naive as we are, we had believed the bootlegger went out of business with the death of prohibition. So we investigated.

Here are some of the results:

Bootlegging is a bigger business today than at any time since the eighteenth amendment went off the books in 1933.

In 1949, for which complete statistics are available, Federal, State, and local police officers throughout the United States confiscated 18,884 stills which had a combined capacity of 529,456 gallons daily. These stills are estimated to have operated an average of 90 days each before they were knocked off.

For each day they functioned, there was a Federal and State tax loss of $5,543,920, or a total tax loss of $498,952,800 for the 90-day average period.

The basic Federal excise tax on whisky is $9 per 100-proof gallon, and the average State tax is $1.48 per 100-proof gallon. (New York State tax is $1.50.) It should be noted that there are many other taxes on legal liquor, but the above are the principal and basic ones.

Only in the last peak years of prohibition was the bootlegger more active than he is today.

In those dry years, enforcement officers were confiscating stills at the rate of 25,000 a year—a figure which compares with the 18,884 stills put out of business in 1949.

The incentives for the distiller and distributor of "rot gut" illegal whisky are the same as they were during prohibition and in about the same degree—big, quick, easy money.

He starts right off with a $10.48 (per 100-proof gallon) tax advantage over his legal competitor. He can sell a gallon of his poisonous product, usually 190-proof, for as low as $4 or $5.

One gallon of bootleg whisky of 190-proof can be cut into 2 gallons of salable liquor.

The bootlegger, of course, has few of the other expenses of the legal manufacturer.

He does not have to pay for insurance, analysis, warehousing, or financing. True, his product may be injurious to health, even fatal, but what does he care? He is not liable.

We have always believed that the American people, when they junked the eighteenth amendment, were not so much voting liquor back in as they were voting bootlegging, gangsterism, and vast empires of corruption out.

We don't know what the full solution is to the present, and rather alarming, rebirth of the illegal hootch business.

Obviously, more enforcement is necessary to protect the Government's own legal sources of taxation. The Federal Government today does not have enough "revenooers" to more than whittle away at the edges of the bootlegging industry.

Obviously, also, liquor is something which should be taxed, and taxed heavily, but there is a point beyond which taxation cannot go.

In other words, Government—Federal and State—should not recreate, by taxes, a corrupt and abominable situation which the people killed by ballot.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] for proposing, and the Committee on Ways and Means for accepting, the amendment prohibiting future trade concessions to Soviet Russia and those nations she dominates. I am also sympathetic with the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, which was ruled not in order, and which would have applied to existing agreements.

I am hopeful that the action of the committee in agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin indicates that favorable consideration will be given to a resolution, introduced by me and a number of my colleagues during the Eighty-first Congress, and reintroduced in this Congress. My resolution provides "that it is the sense of the Congress that the President should take such action as may be necessary to rescind any foreign-trade agreement negotiated with any foreign country, or any instrumentality thereof, under the provisions of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, if the Secretary of State is of the opinion that the government of such foreign country is Communist controlled."

When this resolution had been pending before the committee last Congress for many months, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST] filed a discharge petition, which, unfortunately failed.

I had intended to offer this resolution as an amendment to H. R. 1612 yesterday, but because of the tradition to recognize only members of the committee, was not able to offer it. The point of order raised against the first proposal of the gentleman from Wisconsin precluded my offering it as a substitute, and the rapidity with which the committee accepted his second proposal, prevented its being offered a second time. To secure any relief to American industry, the principles announced in the amendment, must apply to existing treaties.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, we can obtain action on the resolution itself. I believe if we do, it will pass, and grant to our industry the relief sought to prevent unfair competition.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE AIR COORDINATING COMMITTEE — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 55)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information and consideration of the Congress the Annual Report of the Air Coordinating Committee for the calendar year 1950.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1951.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 37) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Armed Services is authorized, until otherwise provided by law, to employ two additional clerical assistants, to be paid from the contingent fund of the House at a rate of compensation to be fixed by the chairman in accordance with section 202 (c) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 42) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the further expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by clause (1) (Q) of rule XI incurred by the Committee on Un-American Activities, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $200,000, including expenditures for employment of such experts, special counsel, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by the chairman of the committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official stenographers to committees may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

That the funds granted may be expended retroactive to January 4, 1951, and such funds shall remain available until expended.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is there an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. STANLEY. There is no amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I inquire as to how the amount carried this year compares with the amount carried last year?

Mr. STANLEY. In the first session of the Eighty-first Congress there was appropriated $200,000; in the second session an additional $150,000 was appropriated of which $25,000 was unexpended as of January 1, 1951.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This carries the amount, then, that was appropriated during the first session of the last Congress.

Mr. STANLEY. Yes, the first session of the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I may say to the gentleman from Virginia that I am, of course, in favor of the continuance of this committee. I think it has done a splendid job, but I have been considerably worried, to tell the frank truth, by the fact that the committee has not met since January 1. Many people believe that there was a little slow-down in the committee last year. I hope those beliefs are not well-founded. But I think when the committee is asking for money at this time that we ought to have an understanding as to whether the committee is going to do what it was set up to do, whether it is going to carry on this great work of exposing communism in the United States.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. I may state that the clerks of the committee have not been paid since December, and the committee has not met for the reason that we have had no appropriation. The only staff we have are the people who are willing to serve in the belief that ultimately they will be compensated.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Might I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the members of the committee are all Members of Congress? They are paid to be here and they ought to have had a meeting before now.

Mr. WALTER. I should like to remind the minority leader that the ranking Member on the Republican side has been ill, and out of deference to him we have been waiting for some information concerning his attitude on certain things we intend to do.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is true that the ranking member on the Republican side is ill, but the other three minority members are here and ready to go to work.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this committee was never more important than it is today. Our danger from communism is at home. This country is permeated with them and they are going underground, many of them getting on the Federal payroll. I would like to see this committee get all the money it needs and at the same time I would like to see them speed up some of these investigations and expose the enemies within our gates. While our boys are being killed, or freezing to death in Korea, these Reds ought not to be permitted to undermine their country. For God's sake, let us protect the country at home.

Mr. STANLEY. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to state that under Executive order dated March 1947 the President designated the Committee on Un-American Activities as a source of information to check in connection with loyalty investigations in the executive departments and also in other departments, and further to report on the activities of this committee. During 1950 representatives of the executive departments and other agencies, including Central Intelligence, the FBI, the Metropolitan Police, and the United States Secret Service, made over 3,600 visits to the office to investigate and see the files of the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What did that committee do after they made all of these visits? I do not mean the Un-American Activities Committee. I mean the President's committee.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman restate his question?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman has been making a great point of the fact that the President's committee visited the office of the Un-American Activities Committee.

Mr. STANLEY. That was in reply to the gentleman's statement that there had been no activity. I was informing him there had been considerable activity since 1950.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I did not say that the committee was not active.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman said there was a slow-down.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There has been a slow-down of the work of the committee which we all regret, because we take great pride in what the committee has accomplished in the past. We want it to go ahead and do a similar work in the future. I am not protesting this amount, I think it is very small, but I do hope that the committee will be stimulated a little to proceed with its work.

Mr. STANLEY. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to make a comment and also propound a query. First of all, I think it is quite a tribute to the House Committee on Un-American Activities that the President has seen fit to issue an Executive order permitting the various intelligence agencies and other agencies of the Government to turn to the files of the Un-America Activities Committee for information. This would indicate that the committee has in past years obtained a lot of important information on matters of loyalty; but it seems to me to be rather a sad commentary that while the President of the United States has seen fit to turn to a congressional committee to obtain information on questions of loyalty somehow or other the Congress of the United States has been unable to obtain from the various agencies of the Government under the control of the Executive the information that it desires as to the question of loyalty of many employees.

I rose to ask the gentleman whether or not any of this amount of $200,000 carried in the resolution can be used for the printing of testimony or reports?

Mr. STANLEY. I will say to the gentleman that it cannot be.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It cannot be used for the printing of hearings?

Mr. STANLEY. In the breakdown of the proposal on expenditures there is nothing to that effect. It cannot be used for that purpose.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am interested, because there was considerable testimony given last year before this committee as to communistic activities in Ohio, and it was seemingly impossible to get any printed or even typed copies of that testimony during the latter part of 1950. I am wondering if there is any way that that testimony can be made available to the Members of Congress as well as to the people of Ohio who, being rather patriotic Americans, are very much interested in the communistic activities that have been going on in the State of Ohio, and the persons who are responsible therefor.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. I am quite certain that the gentleman from Ohio, zealous as he always is in safeguarding the interests and right sof the American people, will agree that it would be a very dangerous thing to publish the testimony of a man who was committed on several occasions to mental institutions, who was convicted of crimes and whose statements before the committee, statements under oath, were not true as checks made by the investigators of our committee will disclose. There is no reason why any Member of Congress cannot see that testimony, but when they do examine it, I know that they will reach the conclusion that was reached by the members of the committee, that it was very dangerous, to say the least.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Might I reply to the gentleman by saying that, of course, each Member of Congress should have the opportunity to see the testimony and to judge for himself the correctness of the statements that have been made. I certainly have the highest respect for the gentleman from Pennsylvania. However, I am not unmindful of the fact that the gentleman to whom he refers as being a witness before the committee was, for a great many years, a representative of and an undercover agent for the Federal Bureau of Investigation who somehow or other found him sufficiently capable and sufficiently honest to use him and to predicate upon his investigations many of the actions taken by the FBI, and whether he be completely pure as the wind-driven snow or not, I believe that the great State of Ohio and the great newspapers of that State that helped to reveal these activities have the right to know just what is what, and when is when, and who is who, and to judge for themselves. I am rather of the opinion, with all due respect, that perhaps the people of the State of Ohio are as capable of passing on the veracity and the honesty and the mental capacity of this gentleman as the Members of the committee or the Members of Congress, and I hope that the records may be made available.

Mr. WALTER. Just to keep the record straight, the man to whom the gentleman refers was never an agent of the FBI. He was, to use the technical term that was applied to him by a representative of that organization, an unpaid stool pigeon. I hope that the gentleman will distinguish that status from that of an agent of the FBI.

The distinguished minority leader has talked about the lack of activity on the part of this committee during the last Congress, and in that regard at this point I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks the report on the work done during the Seventy-ninth, Eightieth, and Eighty-first Congresses. I am sure that after the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Massachusetts have examined that record, they will reach the conclusion that the committee did lots more work during the Eighty-first Congress than at any time in the history of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I say to the gentleman in conclusion, for I do not want to prolong this discussion, that, having been unable to see the record to which the gentleman referred, I am unable to judge whether his statement is correct or whether the statements made by the Cincinnati Enquirer, the greatest Democratic paper in the Middle West, in which it exposed all of these activities, or attempted to, and made statements and wrote the complete story of the undercover agents, and quoted FBI agents, by the way, have been correct. If I could read all the testimony I might know.

Mr. WALTER. If the gentleman will yield, the witness about whom the gentleman is talking first testified before the Committee on Un-American Activities during the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Let us look at the record; then we can judge by that.

Mr. WALTER. The then Republican-controlled Committee on Un-American Activities reached the same conclusion that the Committee on Un-American Activities reached in the Eighty-first Congress, and did not release the testimony of the witness that they felt was irresponsible. The then Republican-controlled Committee on Education and Labor also heard this witness during the Eightieth Congress and they also did not release his testimony.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Let us see the testimony.

Mr. WALTER. I extend to the gentleman from Ohio an invitation to go to the Committee on Un-American Activities at his leisure and examine the record.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I appreciate the gentleman's cordial invitation. I hope the other members of the committee will join in that. I should like to see that record. I have been trying to see it for a good many months, and so have the people of Ohio.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. May I say to my distinguished colleague from Ohio that I assume we are talking about one Matthew Cvetic, who testified. Is that correct? The gentleman was talking about the testimony of Mr. Cvetic?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. No; the gentleman has one of the eastern Ohio men in mind. I do not believe the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities. I was not inquiring about Mr. Cvetic, or whatever his name is.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. I want to point out to the gentleman that I tried to get some information from the Committee on Un-

American Activities, as apparently the gentleman did.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. He is from eastern Ohio, I think.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. No, he is from Pittsburgh. He is alleged to have named some people in eastern Ohio who were Communists. I was interested in finding out about it. Some of the members of that staff over there, who seemed to be perhaps in their own opinion more important than Members of Congress, first decided that I could not see it. Later, perhaps after they screened me, they decided it would be safe to let me look at it, and I did get access to it.

Mr. WALTER. The testimony of Matthew Cvetic, whose name was just mentioned, has been printed and is a matter of public record, so all the gentleman from Ohio has to do is get a copy of his testimony. It is printed.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. I realize it is printed now, but at the time I wanted it it was not printed and it was not easy to get from some of the employees of the Committee on Un-American Activities.

May I say further that it is no fault of the House Administration Committee that the Un-American Activities Committee has not had their money before this, because, the minute a meeting was called of the subcommittee on Accounts, we went in there and heard the chairman and the ranking majority member. They asked for $200,000, and the subcommittee unanimously voted to give it to them.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think the gentleman will agree we are both very much interested, as are all the people in Ohio, in seeing any Communist activities in our State exposed.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. That is true.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. All we are trying to do is get the information, so that we may proceed accordingly. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. That is correct.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNEY. Will the gentleman tell me if this resolution, House Resolution 42, brought up today is any different in its language than the resolution that was brought up a year ago?

Mr. STANLEY. There is no difference.

Mr. KEARNEY. If that is so, I should like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Virginia why it is that this resolution then does not cover the expense of printing the testimony of the various witnesses.

Mr. STANLEY. The resolution will be offered when the Committee on Un-American Activities desires to have its hearings published, or it can have certain publications made under its own appropriations, that is already made.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course I am delighted that there seems to be a revival of righteousness at the other end of the Avenue, so far as the Committee on Un-American Activities is concerned. I certainly hope they will now release the Condon letter which the FBI wrote a few years ago.

I call your attention to the fact that on the front page of the paper this morning there is carried the story of the conviction of Remington. I tried to cross-examine Miss Bentley about Remington in the Eightieth Congress and I was denied that opportunity by the then chairman of the committee. Miss Bentley had been a Communist and she knew them and had been associated with them. Every time one of these Communists has repented and turned state's evidence, they have been able to produce documents. But we have never been able to get that letter which the FBI wrote about Condon.

And then they put Anna Rosenberg at the head of the Department of National Defense, you might say. This man DeSola was a Communist. He had turned state's evidence and he pointed to her and said, "She is the individual." They said she was the wrong Anna Rosenberg.

But if you ever saw her or her picture, you would know that nobody could mistake her for someone else. Besides, in the Dies Committee report she is mentioned four times in appendix IX and she is called "Anna M. Rosenberg," in the reference appendix thereto. Yet she has been placed in the most responsible position over the manpower of the Nation. This man Condon is still down there at the head of the Bureau of Standards, after all that information which the FBI dug up. Then that report was concealed and the Committee on Un-American Activities was denied access to it when the Committee on Un-American Activities was trying to expose the Communists within our gates.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. YATES. With reference to the charge against Anna Rosenberg, I would like to the say to the gentleman that a committee of another body has come out with a unanimous report on Mrs. Rosenberg and confirmed her appointment unanimously.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. POTTER. I am wondering if the members of the committee of the minority have been informed, if the funds become available today, which I assume they will be, when we will have a meeting to organize the committee.

Mr. STANLEY. It is the understanding that the committee is already organized and has been organized from the beginning of this Congress.

Mr. POTTER. If that is true, then they failed to notify the minority members.

Mr. STANLEY. Of course the gentleman would have to get that information from the committee itself. The Committee on House Administration, of course, does not go into the question of the operation of the committee.

Mr. POTTER. Would the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so that the Members will know and have some idea as to when the committee will meet to organize?

Mr. STANLEY. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the purpose of having the gentleman from Michigan propound a question.

Mr. POTTER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania have any idea now that the money, as I assume, will be made available, when the committee will have its first meeting to organize?

Mr. WALTER. According to my information, a meeting was scheduled yesterday on the theory that by that time this money would have been appropriated and we would know where we were. But the brother of Mr. WOOD, chairman of the committee, died and was buried on yesterday, and for that reason the meeting was called off.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. POTTER. I hope the committee will not wait until the ranking minority member gets back from the hospital, as was inferred from your statement, because other members of the committee have been anxious to have the committee organized. It is most embarrassing to pick up the paper day after day and find statements as to what the Committee on Un-American Activities is doing, and not be informed. So I hope the gentleman will convey that information to the chairman of the committee when he returns.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How did the committee agree to ask for this $200,000 appropriation if it never met?

Mr. WALTER. The chairman of the committee was called to a meeting, I believe last week——

Mr. STANLEY. A meeting of the Subcommittee on Accounts.

Mr. WALTER. The Subcommittee on Accounts. On the morning of the meeting the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WOOD] called me and asked me if I would accompany him. He suggested that it would be proper to apply for the same amount that the committee had last year. This, despite the fact that added burdens have made it apparent that the money is not going to reach.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The only question I am bringing up is that the Armed Services Committee, for instance, met and voted that they wanted $50,000, and they went to the Committee on House Administration and asked for it. But apparently your committee has not asked for it.

Mr. WALTER. I do not have any other information as to how the amount was arrived at.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Were any of the minority members of the committee consulted about the amount at all?

Mr. WALTER. They are whenever they are available.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What do you mean by "available"? They are here all the time.

Mr. WALTER. Of course, during the last session of the Congress, with the exception of one or two members on the minority, the other members did not attend.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not know what the discussion is all about, but from past experience I realize the committee is going to get all the money it asks for, and when it asks for it. There is a great deal to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] said. Let me illustrate it this way. A week or two ago I received a wire and also a letter from an individual who offered to come down here and shoot a high official in the executive department and to pay his own expenses. I turned it over to the FBI. Yesterday I received a registered letter, four pages all pasted together, and it indicated to me very clearly, if I am any judge at all, that that individual should be in some asylum. That is the way a great many of these things turn out. I can understand why the testimony of some witnesses should not be broadcast, blackening the name of some individual, as has happened in the past. But I am not asking for the printing of any testimony. Time and again we do receive requests for reports of the committee. As an illustration, I have been asked for copies of that pamphlet put out by the committee, One Hundred Things You Should Know About Communism. Then, I have asked for these other pamphlets where the names of individuals are listed and their connections with subversive organizations. I understand the gentleman to say that this request for funds does not include authority to print those reports—or does it?

Mr. STANLEY. It does not.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then, I hope that sometime the committee will come in and ask for the money to do that. I will have to vote for that appropriation, to provide money sufficient to print these pamphlets that you have already put out at other times but the supply of which has been exhausted.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman understands the committee has authority to print its reports.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Regardless of what may be said, it is a fact that the resolution now before the House was offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WOOD], chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, and it appears it was filed on January 3. As soon as the Subcommittee on Accounts had a chance to act on this resolution, the committee did act and approved the amount, $200,000. It is true also that the House Committee on Administration immediately reported this out. The amount is $200,000. It is considerably less than the committee has had in previous years. So far as the Committee on House Administration knows, the Committee on Un-American Activities plans to proceed with investigations forthwith.

Mr. STANLEY. That is correct.

Mr. LECOMPTE. The resolution asking for money for the Armed Services Committee is authorized in a resolution adopted by this House.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield briefly.

Mr. KEARNEY. I might say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] that his statement is a little erroneous, because the three minority members of that committee were present every day but we were not consulted in the slightest.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 114) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by House Resolution 38, Eighty-second Congress, incurred by the Committee on Armed Services, not to exceed $50,000, including expenditures for the employment of experts, special counsel, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee and signed by the chairman of the committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 127) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers provided for by section 5 of Public Law 115, Seventy-eighth Congress, shall consist of two members of the Committee on House Administration to be appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia if one of the resolutions we just passed would allow two new investigators as to contracts by the Army?

Mr. STANLEY. It would allow the employment of two additional members of the clerical force.

Mr. NICHOLSON. For the purpose of looking into contracts?

Mr. STANLEY. No; they are to be members of the clerical force whose duties are to be assigned by the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE WHITTEN RIDER

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an article appearing in the Daily News.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in the last 2 weeks as a result of having been the author of the so-called Whitten rider, which makes an effort to hold down the total number of permanent personnel in the Federal service to the level existing in September 1950, and which further makes an effort to make available to the defense agencies trained personnel from other civilian agencies which it is believed will have less to do and therefore have surplus personnel, I have received numerous calls and visits from permanent employees in the Federal Government who for patriotic reasons have supplied me with information with regard to how many places in Government there are whole sections of employees with little to do.

From these reports which come from within the departments themselves, instead of the department making it easy for such employees to move to places where they will have fulltime work, which they want, these departments are busy trying to get themselves designated as defense agencies and are trying to find something to do or some new program in which they can enlist the department so as to keep these employees.

In hearings before our subcommittee last year, the head of one of our larger agencies denied to me that he had folks who were not busy because, as he said, "I find them something to do."

Unfortunately, too frequently that is the attitude—made work—to keep them busy, instead of releasing them to do work badly needed in the defense agencies. We must see to it that the Civil Service Commission acts now and we must see to it that the old-line departments cooperate.

Mr. Speaker, there are literally thousands of patriotic workers who due to the change in the national situation realize that they are not fully needed nor busy within their own department, who are trained and experienced and would be glad to help the national defense agencies during the period of emergency if the department and the civil service would simply make it possible for them to secure a leave of absence during the emergency with full right of reemployment to their present job.

Mr. Speaker, today every department in Government should be required to send out to each employee that it has in Washington and in many other offices, asking each employee whether he would be willing to take a leave of absence and serve in a national defense agency, if he were assured the right to return to his job at the end of the emergency. From the calls and visits I have had I am led to believe that thousands and thousands would gladly accept such a proposition.

The civil service then should be required to work out a full right to return to the job upon the department's giving such leave of absence. These names would be certified to the national defense agencies.

Legislation should not be necessary to carry out these needed actions. All we need is for the Civil Service Commission and the departments to use the authority they now have. The so-called Whitten rider would have been unnecessary if the Commission had been willing to take this action. The action recommended here is within the intent of that rider and if the Commission and the departments will cooperate additional experienced personnel will be made available to the defense agencies, and additional millions of dollars will be saved.

Such expert personnel could then help the Congress in its effort to hold in check the defense agencies, many of which would mushroom far too fast at great expense. Already reports are coming in that one of the recently established agencies has brought in at $65 per day a large group of advisers, renting of expensive hotel suites for conference rooms when there are hundreds of caucus rooms to be had in Government buildings here in Washington, which could be used without expense, and thousands of just as capable people who would assist in an advisory capacity at far less cost, including perhaps those same people who are here at $65 per day. The same reports come in concerning the setting up of other agencies. Perhaps they do not realize the total amount involved if all did that, or perhaps they are looking at the figures of the national debt as an asset. In setting up new agencies the best personnel people in the regular departments should be borrowed for such purposes.

I have introduced H. R. 110, which would provide a special committee to investigate the use of facilities and manpower. Such a committee with an adequate staff could save millions. I offer as proof the facts set forth in my speech in the House of Representatives on January 29, 1951.

The position I take is not altogether popular with the Civil Service Commission, but it heartens me to know there are thousands and thousands of Federal employees who are on our side in this effort. We must hold down at the beginning, at the setting up. We on the Appropriations Committee, with the approval of the Congress, will do our best to hold down and to cut appropriations where it can be done without injury, but after the money is spent or the commitment made, it is too late for the Appropriations Committee to do much about it. It avails us nothing to close the stable door after the horse is gone.

Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Washington Daily News of February 2, 1951, by Mr. John Cramer, which clearly shows the fallacies of the so-called recent answer of the Civil Service Commission to a speech, mentioned a moment ago, which I made on January 29, 1951, and which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date:

9 TO 4:30

WHITTEN GETS "REPLY"

(By John Cramer)

Your United States Civil Service Commission has come out with what purports to be a reply to Representative JAMIE L. WHITTEN, Democrat, Mississippi.

Representative WHITTEN is the author of the so-called Whitten rider of last late summer, which put most Government personnel actions on a temporary basis.

In a House speech this week, he roundly lambasted the Commission for dragging its feet and generally messing up the handling of Government manpower problems since the start of the Korean crisis.

If Mr. WHITTEN has any slightest doubt about the accuracy of his charges, the Commission's "reply" should set his doubt at rest.

The Commission statement makes certain valid points against the Whitten rider. For example: The fact that the rider discourages former United States employees from reentering Federal service, because it permits only temporary appointments for them—and sharply restricts their grades and pay.

Facts and syntax

Having done this, the Commission then proceeds to some remarkable twisting of facts and, also, syntax.

First. It complains that the "Whitten rider has impeded the movement of Government workers to defense agencies. * * * Specifically, by requiring that all transfers be temporary, many permanent employees have hesitated to give up their permanent positions in nondefense agencies to accept temporary jobs in defense agencies, even with reemployment rights.

That's what the Commission says. The facts are:

That Federal employee transfers during World War II were exclusively on a temporary basis—and this most definitely did not impede the free movement of workers to defense agencies.

Not the rider

That the thing which is impeding such transfers now is not the Whitten rider, but, instead, the Commission's own severe restrictions on reemployment rights for employees who do transfer. Under its rules, the employee transferring to a defense agency can be given reemployment rights only if he goes to a job which the Commission has listed as critical.

This list is a very narrow one—and here is proof: The Army, Navy, and Air Force have several thousand job vacancies here and are finding increasing difficulty in filling them. But most of the vacancies can't be filled by transfers from other agencies, for the simple reason that the Civil Service hasn't yet seen fit to put the particular job involved on its critical list.

That the Commission's transfer program not only impedes free transfers to defense agencies but in fact was designed mainly to make it easier for nondefense agencies to convert back to normal operations after the war. The Commission itself let this particular cat out of the bag when it announced its transfer program in November. It spoke then of the desirability of avoiding chaos in the nondefense agencies after the emergency.

Second twisting

Now here is the second way in which the Commission twisted the facts in its reply to Representative WHITTEN. The Commission's statement said:

"The Commission, long before the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, studied the possible needs of the service in the eventuality of a greater emergency developing. It had worked out detailed plans to be put into effect when the situation required it."

No authority

The Commission further said that it had noted Mr. WHITTEN's comment that the Commission waited months to announce a policy on reemployment rights. The fact is that until Executive Order 10180 was signed the Commission had no authority to require an agency head to grant such rights. The Executive order was published in the Federal Register on November 15. The Commission's new regulation establishing a system of reemployment rights was published in the Register on the same day.

From this you might gather that the Commission had its plans all ready for the pressing of the push button. You might be led to believe that the Commission had no responsibility whatever for its long delay in setting up a reemployment system. You might, quite reasonably, get the idea that the Commission was trying to put the blame on the White House.

Neglected facts

The Commission, however, neglected to mention these facts:

That the Commission is expected, in the ordinary course of things, to initiate Executive orders such as the one on reemployment rights.

That the Commission is expected to carry the big share of the load in preparing such orders.

That its failure to do these things promptly and vigorously was, as this reporter has confirmed, a major reason for the delay in issuing the reemployment rights Executive order.

All this presumably is known to the officials responsible for the Commission's reply to Mr. WHITTEN. It is mentioned here for the benefit of Mr. WHITTEN and others who possibly might be misled by the Commission's fact twisting.

And you are welcome to the conclusion that the Commission was not completely—well, let's say—forthright in its statement.

ROLL-BACK OF PRICES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include various articles, statements, editorials, and newspaper material.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRIEST). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing H. R. 2515, a bill to roll prices and wages back to June 25, 1950, and to impose a 100 percent tax on excess profits above the normal peacetime profit of the year 1949.

I have watched with dismay and anger the unwarranted increase in the cost of living. I have taken the floor of this House on a number of occasions to request and to demand that something be done to curb the dangers which the number one domestic problem of inflation presents.

I have attacked the January 26, 1951, order freezing prices and wages at the highest levels and ignoring profits because it is an order which will not control inflation.

Just yesterday, according to the Washington Post of February 8, 1951, Economic Stabilizer Eric Johnston told a press conference that a further rise in the cost of living for a few months is inevitable. He further stated that by midsummer price levels could be held relatively stable on a plateau for a considerable period, perhaps until the end of the year. The implication is that even into 1952 price rises will continue and that we can look forward to increasing inflation and all its accompanying evils.

Since June 25, 1950, prices in general have advanced in excess of 6 percent to an all-time high, corporation profits after taxes have increased by 21.8 percent, and food prices have advanced on the average of 2 percent a month. Some organized workers have received increases in wages but take-home pay has not been increased, but rather decreased, due to high costs and increased taxation. The unorganized workers, the pensioners, those living on annuities, people working for State, municipal, and county governments—the so-called white-collar class—have received no relief whatsoever and are slowly being ground down.

If a roll-back is not soon ordered we cannot escape more inflation which in turn will be accompanied by more strikes.

We should be ashamed of the so-called stabilization policy we have foisted on the people of this country. We should be ashamed of the way we are deliberately allowing the dollar to lose its value.

We should be aware of the fact, now, that if this mad economic situation continues, we are all going to lose. If that happens, it will be good news to the men in the Politburo.

We have wasted 7½ months in futile talk and useless orders. The cost of living is now 81 percent above prewar levels. We have taken half-way, timid steps when direct and courageous action is needed. The only place where that action can and should be taken is in the Congress of the United States and the people are looking to us for action and leadership.

Mr. Speaker, it is my sincere hope that action will be taken on my bill as soon as possible so that the No. 1 domestic problems of inflation can be met and defeated.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting at this point in my remarks a speech I made on price control on January 19, 1951, a copy of a statement I made on January 27, 1951, after the price-wage freeze was announced by the ESA, two articles by John Suchy carried in the Missoula Mirror, a laboratory newspaper of the senior seminar class of the School of Journalism at Montana State University, Missoula, Mont., and dated January 24 and 31, 1951, and an article in the Washington Post of February 8, 1951:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, 1951]

PRICE CONTROL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the present inflationary picture is a sorry one indeed. The efforts of the Economic Stabilization Administration to handle and to cope with inflation and price gouging have been very weak and ineffectual. It has been in operation 3 months—3 months marked by timidity, confusion, muddled words, and frenzied inaction.

Run-away prices have been a national scandal since June 25, 1950. At that time, I advocated a wage and price freeze across the board, but was unable to get any action. The Congress, the administration, and the officials selected to supervise the Defense Production Act of 1950 have all fallen down on the job to control inflation.

Mr. Di Salle, Price Director, was reported last week to have been ready to impose a 30-day price-wage freeze, but Mr. Alan Valentine, Director of Economic Stabilization Administration, said, "We have come to the conclusion that we do not plan any present across-the-board freeze of prices." What does he mean and who is he trying to help—or to shield? Certainly not the people of this country who are being harassed by the constant increases in everything they have to buy.

Mr. Speaker, the ineptitude of the ESA is such that it should either be abandoned or a new and strong group of officials named to administer the program. How are you going to collect taxes if this inflationary spiral keeps up, and how are you going to impose new taxes if inflation continues?

This is no time for voluntary price controls or vague talk. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that an over-all price-profit-wage control be imposed before another week of profiteering passes by. The people are demanding action and have been since June 25, 1950. The price scandal means cruel and inhuman punishment for thousands of our citizens and imperils our defense effort. The period of inaction in the price-control field has created confusion, bitterness, and frustration.

Big business can—and has—increased prices; organized labor can—and will—demand wage increases; the farmer is protected by support prices, but the great middle group—people living on servicemen's allowances, unorganized white-collar workers, school teachers, State, county, and municipal employees, older persons living on pensions and annuities—all are having trouble making their savings stretch and warding off inflation. Furthermore, redemption of E bonds for the past 9 months have exceeded sales, which indicates that people are being forced to spend beyond their incomes and that inflation is our No. 1 and most serious domestic problem.

The times call for equality of sacrifice in the payment of taxes, the granting by Congress to the Department of Agriculture the right to sell stored commodities to force down prices, and the imposition of direct controls and price ceilings to keep down prices to stop inflation.

We need:

First. A real excess-profits tax of 100 percent above normal peacetime profits—average profits run 51 percent over last year, and some corporations' profits as high as 286 percent.

Second. Elimination of existing tax loopholes so that our economy can be placed on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Third. A roll-back on prices to halt inflation.

Fourth. Legislation to end commodity-market speculative profiteering.

Fifth. A halt to nonessential Government expenditures.

The picture of inflation is a very dangerous one. The need for drastic action is now, and I urge that we enact legislation to roll back prices to October 1, 1950, although I would personally prefer to have the date set at June 25, 1950. The people want action, and they are looking to this Congress for leadership and results in the fight against inflation.

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN MIKE MANSFIELD, DEMOCRAT, OF MONTANA, JANUARY 27, 1951

I am disturbed, disheartened, and angry over the price-wage freeze just announced by the Economic Stabilization Agency.

It is an act of timidity when the times call for decisions of courage and strength. It means in effect that high prices will remain at their highest level and beyond that will go still higher in the weeks and months ahead due to the loopholes in the order. I have consistently maintained that there should have been an "across-the-board freeze since June 27, 1950" and have on several occasions taken the floor to make my position known. The people of the country have taken a deep slash in their take-home pay which this price-wage freeze order helps to accentuate.

This phony freeze is of no benefit to many portions of our people because, while a few will make tremendous profits as a result of high prices, the great majority will continue to suffer increased losses. I do not see how it will be possible to ask the people to pay more in the way of taxes if we allow this order to stand and allow inflation to continue unchecked.

The real solution to the problem would have been for a roll-back to June 25, 1950, of a wage-price profit freeze across the board. However, in view of the difficulty and the immediate danger, the next best step would be to issue an order to put into operation a roll-back of prices-wages to October 1, 1950. The people want action and I am quite certain that they are disgusted with the leadership and administration of the ESA on the across-the-board freeze of yesterday."

FOOD COSTS DOUBLE IN 12 YEARS

(By John Suchy)

Price ceilings are expected sometime this week.

Why they are expected is no mystery to most Missoulians. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, foods cost more than twice as much now in the United States as they did in 1939; the entire cost of living is almost double that of prewar years.

Figures for September 1950, place retail national food prices 2.08 times those of a 1935–1939 base period. The entire cost of living is 1.74 times the living cost of that period. These figures show only part of the facts. More recent wholesale price information shows even greater price increases for late 1950 and early 1951.

To confirm this data, a survey of Missoula merchants indicates that local prices are conforming to the national trend. Usual prices quoted in newspaper advertisments of January 1939, January 1945, September 1950, and January 1951, served as a basis for this survey.

Accurate price comparisons for each item could be best compiled for certain food products which enter into the Government's retail food index. Only these are quoted in this first report.

This survey revealed that Missoula food prices are apparently slightly lower than the national average. However, these prices have increased a somewhat greater relative amount since 1939 than have national food price averages. In other words, food prices in Missoula seem to be catching up with those elsewhere.

In 1939 Missoulians could buy round steak for 18 cents a pound. Now it costs 98 cents, 5.44 times as much as before. This means that it has a price index of 544 against an index of 100 for a 1939 base period. The national retail price index for round steak is only about 300. However, Missoula's meat prices are probably no higher than meat prices elsewhere.

Local prices and indexes for several essential food products are tabulated here:

	January price		Current local price index
	1939	1951
Wheat flour (5 pounds)	$0.15	$0.50	333.3
Corn flakes (13 ounces)	.095	.21	221.5
Corn meal (pound)	.028	.10	357.1
White bread (pound)	.10	.22	220.0
Plain boxed cookies (pound)	.125	.35	280.0
Beef rib roast (pound)	.18	.69	327.8
Pork chops (pound)	.19	.64	336.8
Sliced bacon (pound)	.25	.54	216.0
Whole ham (pound)	.25	.65	260.0
Salt pork (pound)	.15	.39	260.0
Pink salmon (pound can)	.131	.62	336.7
Butter (pound quarters)	.32	.88	275.0
Mild cheese (pound)	.25	.49	196.0
Evaporated milk (tall can)	.065	.148	227.7
Eggs (large, dozen)	.27	.63	233.3
Fresh carrots (bunch)	.04	.115	287.5
Dry onions (pound)	.025	.044	176.0
Fresh cabbage (pound)	.07	.08	114.3
U. S. No. 1 potatoes (15 pounds)	.18	.495	275.0
Sweet potatoes (pound)	.06	.125	208.3
Canned peaches (No. 2½)	.21	.29	138.1
Canned pineapple (No. 2½)	.22	.37	168.2
Canned corn (No. 2)	.125	.17	135.5
Canned tomatoes (No. 2)	.09	.19	211.1
Canned peas (No. 303)	.113	.145	128.3
Dried prunes (pound)	.069	.315	456.5
Dried navy beans (pound)	.06	.125	208.3
Coffee (pound tin)	.22	.89	404.5
Lard	.125	.245	195.2
Processed vegetable shortening (pound)	.183	.36	196.7
Oleomargarine (pound)	.22	.38	172.7
Sugar (5 pounds)	.29	.525	181.0

In this limited survey fluctuations in quality could not be accurately gaged. An attempt is made to find average large-retailer prices for each item. Following is a comparison of local and national price indexes as of September 1950, for selected food items:

Food item	Local index	National index
Wheat flour	306.7	192.8
Corn meal	271.4	203.3
Pork chops	310.5	262.1
Sliced bacon	212.0	184.5
Whole ham	212.0	233.9
Salt pork	233.3	181.7
Mild cheese	168.0	227.7
Dried onions	152.0	148.7
Potatoes (No. 1)	[1] 316.7	170.9
Canned peaches	138.1	158.4
Canned corn	[1] 152.0	141.6
Dried prunes	333.0	242.6
Coffee (tin)	368.2	336.1
Processed vegetable shortening	169.4	167.7
Oleomargarine	159.1	173.8
Sugar	170.0	188.4

[1] Indicates new crop not in by September 1950.

A partial picture of local price increases may be obtained by comparing the local price indexes for September 1950 with those of January 1951. A more complete picture may be gained by comparing the prices themselves over several periods of observation. The following table does just that for selected food items:

	January 1939	January 1945	September 1950	January 1951
Wheat flour (5 pounds)	$0.15	$0.24	$0.46	$0.50
Corn meal (pound)	.28	.70	.76	.10
Pork chops (pound)	.19	.33	.59	.64
Evaporated milk (tall can)	.065	.10	.148	.143
Eggs (large, dozen)	.27	.40	.67	.63
No. 1 potatoes (15 pounds)	.18	.69	.57	.495
Canned corn (No. 2)	.125	.14	.19	.17
Dried prunes (pound)	.069	.122	.23	.315
Coffee (pound tin)	.22	.31	.81	.89
Oleomargarine (pound)	.23	.27	.35	.38
Sugar (5 pounds)	.29	.33	.493	.525

MISSOULA PRICE INDEX CLIMBS

(By John Suchy)

What does it cost to live?

Since the Korean war started, the Bureau of Labor Statistics consumers' national price index has been going up about 1 percent a month. On October 15, it stood at 174.8. Last Thursday, when the Government started price controls, it was probably much higher.

Over the divide from Missoula, in Butte, food prices were 214.5 percent higher in October than they were over a 1935–39 base period. An item-by-item survey of Missoula food prices was reported in last week's Mirror.

This is a comparison between late January 1939 and now of prices of some items other than foods that enter into Missoula's cost-of-living pattern. The Bureau of Labor Statistics compiles no national itemized survey for each of these items, so no comparison is listed between Missoula and the Nation as a whole. Differences in quality make it impossible to compare some items.

In January 1939 Missoula and the Nation were worrying about the war in Spain, "Hap" Arnold was calling for a $300,000,000 Air Force expansion program, and the Milwaukee railroad was charging $2.60 for a ski-train round trip to Ronald, Idaho.

A de luxe model Hudson coupe cost $745, delivered at Detroit. Three-year-old 90-proof whisky was advertised at 90 cents a pint. Low-grade hamburger sold at 10 cents a pound.

In 1939 Missoula's one first-run movie theater charged a 40-cent top price, 30 cents in the afternoons. Now the two first-run theaters charge 70-cent top prices. Maximum admission price for the three other theaters was 25 cents. Now it's 65 cents and 60 cents. Children's admissions are now 20 cents, twice what they were in 1939.

Dry goods prices provide a good standard for comparison, since these products of the same brand name differ little in quality over the years. Here are some of them from the same large independent retail department stores—prices of the same brands are compared in all cases:

	1939 [1]		1951
	Brand A	Brand B	Brand A	Brand B
Sheets, percale:
81 by 99 inches	$1.39	$1.29	(2)	(2)
81 by 108 inches	1.49	1.35	$4.00	$3.75
72 by 108 inches	1.39	1.29	3.75	3.75
Towels, terry cloth:
24 by 48 inches	$0.49		$1.50
20 by 40 inches	.23		.85
16 by 28 inches	.19		.50
Heavy wash cloths	.075		.25

[1] These prices were taken from a January white sale advertisement and are from 10 to 25 percent below normal prices for the time. This store had no January white sale on these items in 1951.

[2] Not available.

In January 1939 another independent department store in Missoula advertised nationally known towels for 5, 9, 13, 18, and 21 cents. These were not manufacturers' seconds. A retail chain store advertised 81 by 99-inch muslin sheets wash 234 times, by test, at 69 cents each.

The same chain store advertised women's cotton print dresses at 44 cents each. Another chain store listed them at 49 cents. They were common in all stores which sold women's clothes at prices starting no higher than 98 cents. Today's lowest mail-order price for cotton print dresses is $2.29.

Listed below are some more January 1939 and January 1951 Missoula prices for comparable items:

Nationally advertised tires (6:00 x 16): best quality, $15.70, $20.10 (plus $1.12 tax); good quality, $11.80, $14.60 (plus $1.12 tax). Steel cabinet sinks (no fittings), $32, $70. Chain store men's work shoes (cheapest), $1.74, $4.98. Chain store women's shoes (cheapest), $1.77, $4.79. Chain store men's suits (cheapest), $17.77, $36. Chain store sanforized shirts (cheapest), 98 cents, $2.17. Chain store percale print fabrics, 9 cents yard (32 inches), 35 cents yard (35 inches). Furniture (good quality, sale prices): four-piece bedroom suite, $109, $185; mohair living-room suite, $122.50, $229.50; walnut dining-room suite, $69.50, $130; studio couch, $29, $65; 9- by 12-foot rugs, $29 to $90, $69.50 to $175.

About the lowest increase in prices between 1939 and 1951 was in the per line rate for classified advertising in the local daily newspaper. In 1939 it was 14 cents; now it's 15 cents. The same paper used to cost 20 cents a week, delivered by carrier in Missoula. Now it's 35 cents per week.

JOHNSTON SEES NEW PRICE RISES, LEVELING OFF BY MIDSUMMER

Economic Stabilizer Eric Johnston told an impromptu press conference yesterday that a further rise in the cost of living for a few months is inevitable.

He added, however, that by midsummer the price levels could be held relatively steady on a plateau for a considerable period, perhaps until the end of the year.

Johnston's forecast of a steady upward movement in prices accords with a view previously expressed by Price Stabilizer Michael V. Di Salle. He has pointed out that the powerful momentum of past increases, like a car going at 60 miles an hour, cannot be braked down instantly.

Furthermore, under the present price-control law, ceilings cannot be placed on most farm products, because their prices are below the parity levels. Yesterday, a spokesman for Mobilization Director Charles E. Wilson confirmed reports that Wilson is also seriously concerned over this aspect of the problem.

Wilson had been reported as favoring some vigorous action to plug this enormous escape hole in the price freeze. Yesterday he conferred with Secretary of Agriculture Brannan and discussed the subject, but in general terms.

Associates of Di Salle have represented the price chief as being loath to get bogged down in a political battle to obtain a change in the law. He was said to be virtually resigned to an attempt to hold prices at parity, when they get there, rather than tackling the farm bloc which opposes amendments that would let farm prices be frozen at lower levels.

Obviously, however, Di Salle would be delighted if Wilson wants to participate in a joint fight for a change in the law.

In his news conference, Johnston said that how long the summer level of prices can be held will depend on whether the budget is balanced, production is increased, and credit controls are tightened.

Johnston said prices can and will be rolled back on some major products, but that he doubted whether those reductions would offset increases in other parts of the economy.

The Economic Stabilizer's mention of credit controls was taken by some observers as a reference to the problem of stopping the enormous expansion of lending by commercial banks since the outbreak of the Korean War. How this is to be done is presently the subject of vigorous dispute between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury.

The FRB proposes somewhat higher interest rates on Federal securities. It feels the concurrent drop in the prices of those issues would deter many banks from selling them whenever they need reserves in order to make loans.

From testimony 2 weeks ago before a congressional committee, it would appear that Johnston sides with the FRB. There are other indications that the FRB position is supported also in other high places in Wilson's Office of Defense Mobilization.

WHY RENT CONTROL SHOULD BE EXTENDED

Mr. FINE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraenous material.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINE. Mr. Speaker, during the last campaign I pointed out to the electorate that if the Republicans were continued in control of the New York State Legislature there would be no opportunity for genuine opposition to the previous rent-control law—a Republican measure sponsored and passed by a Republican controlled legislature, and signed by the Republican governor.

The worst fears of those of us in the State legislature who opposed the Republican rent-control law have now been fully realized. In a joint statement issued on February 5, 1951, Senator Elmer F. Quinn, minority leader of the New York State Senate, and Assemblyman Irwin Steingut, minority leader of the assembly, brought to light the full evils of this alleged rent-control law.

Far from giving the citizens of New York the protection that they had reasonably expected from the State legislature, they now find themselves the helpless victims of rent increases which may well spell the ruination of countless families in the middle and related groups of income.

The new regulations promulgated pursuant to the rent law contain a series of jokers which will automatically become law if not disapproved by a joint resolution of the New York State Senate and Assembly on or before February 15, 1951. On Monday night, last, a Democratic attempt to have such a resolution of disapproval adopted, failed in the assembly. The Republican Party has once again demonstrated that they only give lip service to the needs of the people.

By reason of these disclosures there is but one alternative, if we are sincere in our objectives to give the greatest amount of aid to the people in this present national emergency. Federal rent control should be extended to apply to New York as well as to the rest of the country.

Shelter constitutes one of the primary and basic necessities of life and during the period of this new emergency rents for housing accommodations should continue to be stabilized, regulated, and strictly controlled in order to prevent unreasonable and unwarranted evictions which would inevitably adversely affect the public health, safety, and general welfare of the people.

As the President declared recently, we are in a state of national emergency. The actions of Soviet Russia and its satellites throughout the world leave us no alternative but to take all necessary steps to insure our national defense. One of the vital ramparts of that defense is taking proper care of the basic needs of our citizens here at home so they can produce the needed goods and services so essential for our fighting men abroad.

One of their essential needs is shelter—decent housing at a fair price that they can afford to pay. With construction shortly limited by the large down payments required—around 50 percent if you build a good house—most of the common people have to look to their Government for protection against rent gouging. Like the rest of the Nation New York faces a similar rent crisis and the people need help.

In order that the Members of Congress have a clear picture of the rent crisis in New York, under unanimous consent, I ask that the following release be made a part of the record of my remarks at this point:

JOINT STATEMENT BY SENATOR ELMER F. QUINN, MINORITY LEADER OF THE SENATE, AND ASSEMBLYMAN IRWIN STEINGUT, MINORITY LEADER OF THE ASSEMBLY

In 1950, when Governor Dewey succeeded in having his own rent control law passed by the legislature, we announced our vigorous opposition, pointing out that its many weaknesses, its inadequately defined sections, and its obvious inequities would result in sever hardship for untold numbers of families.

We introduced a bill of our own that would have provided strong rent control. We predicted that the passage of the Republican bill would lead to the breakdown of effective rent control. Our fears were more than justified. The new set of regulations proposed by the rent control commissioner will take the lid off rent ceilings—will mean increases for almost one-half the tenants of New York State.

One of the provisions of that law to which we particularly objected was that giving the rent commissioner authority to set up his own plan of controlling rents to take effect on March 1, 1951. We denounced this grant of power to one man as a dangerous precedent and a flagrant surrender of legislative authority to a commissioner who could do anything he wanted with rent control.

The commissioner has now submitted his regulations for future rent control. As we predicted, they will open the way for many new rent increases, many new hardships for tenants.

Of the regulations laid down by the rent commissioner, the following we regard as particularly treacherous.

1. The fair-value formula: This inflationary device provides that a landlord may raise his rent on the basis of his property's assessed valuation, so that he is guaranteed an income of 4 percent of the property's worth. This means that a landlord can raise rents indefinitely—first, he can increase his rental on the basis of his assessed valuation, then he can raise the value of his property on the basis of new rent increases, thereby qualifying for still another rent increase because of the higher assessed valuation of his property.

2. Subdivisions: The 1950 law gave landlords the power to remove apartments from rent control by subdivision or conversion. Under this section of the law, a landlord can inform the tenant at any time that he plans to convert his apartment from one apartment into two or more apartments. He can evict the tenant and the tenant has no redress. And, once the apartment is converted, it is no longer under rent control.

The rent administrator's regulations provide that subdivisions can only occur when an apartment is undertenanted. A six-room dwelling inhabited by two parents to two teen-age children is defined as undertenanted—and such a family is powerless against an eviction for the purpose of subdividing. Once that subdivision occurs, of course, the landlord may charge what he pleases for the two or more new apartments he has made for himself. Meanwhile, there are thousands of such apartments of six or more rooms, lived in by typical middle-income families throughout the State.

3. The 15-percent voluntary rent increases: Under this regulation, it would be perfectly possible for landlords who have already received a 15-percent rent increase by virtue of Federal laws to obtain an additional 15-percent increase now, either by "voluntary" agreement with a tenant under the "fair net" operating formula.

That such increases would be voluntary on the tenants' part is little more than a farce. By threatening to subdivide the apartment, the landlord virtually forces the tenant to consent to an increase. Or, by asserting that he is not getting a fair return on his property's assessed valuation, the landlord can again put the tenant on the spot when he asks for a 15-percent voluntary increase.

4. Evictions permitted without proof of compelling necessity: The owner of a one- or two-family house of a cooperative apartment may have a tenant evicted if he wishes to occupy the premises himself, even though there is no evidence that he, the landlord, needs to change his accommodations.

5. Exemptions from controls: The rent administrator's regulations fail to correct the discriminatory provision in the law which exempts from control all new housing completed since February 1, 1947, and new housing created through remodeling after May 1, 1950. Again the sky is the limit for rentals charged for such accommodations.

An equitable rent-control law would provide that newly built apartments be controlled on the basis of the first rental charged—such a rental having been fixed in a free market.

In our opinion the provisions of the law passed in the 1950 session, combined with the regulations concerning the granting of rent increases laid down last month by the rent commissioner, all but destroy effective rent control in New York State. That we should be pursuing such a disastrous course at a time when total mobilization points to an even greater housing shortage, is truly unthinkable.

It is only fair to the citizens of New York State that they know how their legislators stand on the vital question of effective rent control. This week we will move to discharge from committees of the senate and assembly our resolution disapproving the rent commissioner's regulations. This will give an opportunity to every member of the legislature to state his stand on rent controls—whether he wants to hold the line and hold it firmly, or whether he wants the lid taken off so that skyrocketing rents will add to the peril of national inflation.

Within the next week, we shall submit our own rent-control bill—a bill remedying those inequities of the present regulations which we have already pointed out. Our bill will hold the line on rent control—allowing increases only in those cases where the landlord can prove undue hardship and loss. In that way, we shall provide a second opportunity for every member of the legislature to put himself on record where rent control is concerned.

A DECLARATION OF FRIENDSHIP FROM THE AMERICAN PEOPLE TO ALL OTHER PEOPLE OF THE WORLD

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a House concurrent resolution entitled "A Declaration of Friendship From the American People to All Other People of the World." A similar resolution is being introduced today in the other body by Senator McMAHON, under the joint sponsorship of 21 Senators.

The purpose of the McMahon-Ribicoff resolution is to reaffirm the American peoples' desire to live in peace with all peoples, including the people of the Soviet Union. The resolution will specifically request President Truman to call upon the Soviet Government to make known the contents of this resolution to the Russian people.

Spiritual power and not material power is the key to the world's ills. As a Nation, we must set peace as our goal. The heart of the world must be touched. While we rearm, we must not sidetrack other methods to avoid war. We must never fail to tell the peoples of the world that our goal is peace. This resolution will put the American people and Congress squarely on record as standing for peace instead of war, for life instead of death.

With the best moral case in the world, we are still on the defensive. We must have the vision and imagination to contribute ideas. We cannot lead if we are not guided by a moral and spiritual force of our own.

This resolution is the start of a positive program for peace. It emphasizes the desire of the American people for peace, friendship, and brotherhood with all men throughout the world.

A copy of this resolution is set out below:

A DECLARATION OF FRIENDSHIP FROM THE AMERICAN PEOPLE TO ALL THE PEOPLES OF THE WORLD, INCLUDING THE PEOPLES OF THE SOVIET UNION

Whereas the goal of the American people is now, and ever has been, a just and lasting peace; and

Whereas the deepest wish of our Nation is to join with all other nations in preserving the dignity of man, and in observing those moral principles which alone lend meaning to his existence; and

Whereas in proof of this, the United States has offered to share all that is good in atomic energy, asking in return only safeguards against the evil in the atom; and

Whereas this Nation has likewise given of its substance and resources to help those peoples ravaged by war and poverty; and

Whereas terrible danger to all free peoples compels the United States to undertake a vast program of armaments expenditures; and

Whereas we rearm only with reluctance and would prefer to devote our energies to peaceful pursuits: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Members of this Congress reaffirm the historic and abiding friendship of the American people for all other peoples, including the peoples of the Soviet Union, by declaring—

That the American people deeply regret the artificial barriers which separate them from the peoples of the U. S. S. R., and which keep the Soviet peoples from learning of America's desire to live in friendship with all other peoples, and to work with them in advancing the ideal of human brotherhood; and

That the American people desire neither war with the Soviet Union nor the terrible consequences of such a war; and

That although they are firmly determined to defend their freedom and security, the American people welcome all honorable efforts to compose the differences standing between them and the Soviet Government; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress request the President of the United States to call upon the Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics to acquaint the peoples of the Soviet Union with the contents of this resolution.

BLACK MARKET IN MEAT

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I have unquestionable evidence that the black market in meat is back again with us in New York. As of yesterday it would cost $1,800 under the table to get a chance to bid on a car of dressed beef in the New York market.

Mr. Speaker, I have before me a telegram from a gentleman in New York who knows the meat industry from hogs and beef on the hoof to the finest product as it finds its way on the tables in the best hotels and restaurants in the greatest city in the world. He says:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 8, 1951.
Congressman JAMES G. DONOVAN,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D .C.:

Meat conditions under present Government regulations are chaotic in New York area. Black market conditions rampant. A few weeks of such conditions can make a ruthless wholesaler richer by far than any violator during OPA era. Cash is being exacted and passed. Straight carcass being sold at prices ceilinged for cuts. Low-grade meats being sold for prime quality prices. Most meats lack Federal grading and practically no top quality meats available. General feeling in trade is that there is no patriotic reason for imposition of controls which stifle business when meat prices are not regulated at farm level. Trade does not feel we are at war and it is public knowledge that meat supplies are adequate if all levels of meat industry are given fair profit margins to work with. Resentment high that top qualified men in meat industry are bypassed and advice is accepted from poorer qualified consultants. Impossible to obtain cooperation to convict violators of present regulation because of fear supplies would be shut off to anyone turning in concrete evidence makes it presently impossible to expect or demand such cooperation under existing conditions the following proposed suggestions would gain widespread support for a controlled program from the meat industry at large. Freeze price of feeds and grains. This is only commodity not frozen on farmers list of requirements. On basis of frozen grain prices ratio on beef, veal, lamb, pork, and poultry can be satisfactorily ceilinged at farm level. This permits impositions of fair ceilings on milk, butter, cheese, eggs, flour, and all other byproducts this also permits proper ceilings at slaughter-house level which also readily permits proper ceiling margins to be calculated for wholesale distributor, jobber, hotel supply house, and retail levels. Belief if grain prices must advance is to move up percentagewise at all levels. Obligatory Government grading for all meat of utmost importance. Finally let meat industry do its own policing pledging Government its support in this program.

Very sincerely,

PAUL A. SPITLER.

SEVEN SILVER STARS GIVEN REAR ECHELON BIG SHOTS

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an article.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am going to insert in my remarks an article about seven Silver Stars which were presented to six generals and a colonel in Korea, none of whom had been under fire, and none of whom had been up on the battlefront. Apparently that Silver Star has become quite a coveted award, and these fellows felt that they would look better with it on their chests. I hope the Members will read this newspaper story. I might say that 16 or 17 months ago, when the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments was in Greece, we were up on the Albanian frontier, and some of us heard some gun fire in the distance. I do not know whether that puts us in line for a Silver Star or not, but if it does, I would be embarrassed to accept it, and I do not think I would want to wear it under those circumstances.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Daily News of February 7, 1951]

SEVEN SILVER STARS GIVEN REAR ECHELON BIG SHOTS

(By Jim G. Lucas)

The Air Force has awarded 17 Silver Stars so far. Seven have gone to generals and a colonel based in Tokyo. They usually get to Korea about once a month.

Congress created the Silver Star in 1918 as a reward for "gallantry in action when the Medal of Honor is not warranted."

It specified, however, that such gallantry must be of "marked distinction." The Silver Star has become one of our most coveted decorations. You don't win one hanging around the rear echelon. At least, that's the way it used to be.

Nevertheless Lt. Gen. George Stratemeyer, commander of the Far East Air Force, has presented it to:

HERE'S LIST

Maj. Gen. Laurence Craigie, vice commander for administration and plans.

Maj. Gen. Otto P. Weyland, vice commander for operations.

Brig. Gen. Jarred V. Crabb, deputy commander for operations.

Brig. Gen. Oliver S. Picher, Far East inspector general.

Brig. Gen. Charles Y. Banfill, deputy for intelligence.

Brig. Gen. Derr H. Alkire, deputy for matériel.

Col. Leo J. Erler, director of installations.

NO. 1 MAN

Each man, the citations say, "distinguished himself by gallantry in action in Korea during the period July through November 1950." Each, General Stratemeyer said, acted "in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service."

General Cragie—General Stratemeyer's "No. 1 man"—"made frequent visits to combat elements in Korea to coordinate operations * * * participated in reconnaissance, tactical control, and bombing missions over enemy territory to observe and improve effectiveness of his plans * * * was subject to attack by enemy aircraft and ground fire."

General Weyland also was decorated for flying to Korea occasionally to visit Air Force elements (and) coordinate operations. He participated in bombing missions over enemy territory to obtain first-hand knowledge. Like General Craigie, he was subject to attack by enemy aircraft and ground fire.

General Crabb "at great personal risk and in constant danger * * * made frequent visits to combat Air Force elements in Korea." His participation in combat missions enabled him to improve the effectiveness of his direction of operations.

General Picher—the inspector general in charge of paper work—also is credited with making frequent trips to advanced air bases in Korea to obtain information. General Banfill—in constant danger from enemy ground and aerial attacks—flew to Korea and obtained vital information concerning the enemy.

General Alkire visited the most forward airfields and made ground and aerial surveys to insure an uninterrupted flow of matériel. Ditto Colonel Erler.

NO OPPOSITION

The citations don't say they were fired upon. They were subject to attack. So was everyone else in Korea. The chance of ground attack on even the most forward Air Force base in Korea is remote.

And you can count on one hand the number of enemy planes over Korea after the first week of July. The frequent trips from Japan to Korea simply involved getting in a C-54 transport in Tokyo and getting out in Korea. As a rule it's about as risky as flying from New York to Cleveland. And they went on combat missions merely as passengers and spectators.

CAME HARDER

Other men apparently worked harder for their Silver Stars. Take Hospital Corpsman Vernon Ault, of Greeley, Colo., for instance. His citation said he was "painfully wounded in the arm and leg while serving with a Marine infantry company. Despite pain and extreme loss of blood, he courageously continued to administer to the wounded while under intense enemy machine-gun fire. He refused to be evacuated * * * until he collapsed from his wounds and loss of blood and had to be carried."

William G. Araza, of San Antonio, fearlessly and courageously ran forward under intense machine-gun and antitank fire and, although receiving a painful wound, proceeded to pull a wounded man 30 yards to a covered position and administer aid.

Many Air Force men are bitter. They feel promiscuous awards of the Silver Star to staff officers has cheapened it. One combat pilot who won the Silver Star in World War II for torpedoing a Jap cruiser, told me he had put the medal away and would never wear it again.

DEMOCRATIC STEERING COMMITTEE

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, as acting chairman of the Democratic steering committee, I am calling a meeting in the Rules Committee room at 2 o'clock today, if the House has adjourned at that time; otherwise immediately after the adjournment of the House. The notice went out that the meeting would be held immediately after the adjournment. I am changing that now to make it 2 o'clock today.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman makes his announcement as acting chairman. I hope that after the meeting he will again be chairman.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thank the gentleman.

OUR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS MUST BE PROTECTED

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement by Judge Call of the municipal bench of Los Angeles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States was formulated by the Constitutional Convention to retain all rights of the States and inherent rights of the people in statu quo, except such powers as were therein expressly given and delegated to the Federal Government. The rights and duties of man under the natural law were recognized, and the personal liberty of the individual was to be protected.

Since the adoption of our Constitution, a trend has developed toward liberal and enlarged construction of implied powers of Congress. A drift from the Constitution has become apparent, and its ultimate effects upon our form of government and the extent to which it may encroach upon the liberty of our citizens should receive serious consideration.

An excellent article on this subject appeared in the January issue of the Los Angeles Bar Bulletin. It was written by the Honorable Joseph L. Call, judge of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles. This article should receive thoughtful consideration from the Members of Congress.

[From the Los Angeles Bar Bulletin of January 1951]

THE DRIFT FROM THE CONSTITUTION

(By Hon. Joseph L. Call,* judge of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles)

"Government, through its rulers, may be the implement of tyranny."[1]

This was the political condition that confronted the colonists and precipitated the Declaration of Independence and the War of the Revolution.

The fundamental objection of the colonies was that the colonies and Great Britain were coordinate members of the great English Empire under the dominion of a common sovereign but not united by common legislative sovereignty or legislative rights. The colonists declared that their legislative power to govern themselves was as complete and distinct as that of the English Parliament to govern England. Great Britain maintained that the colonies were subject to English parliamentary laws and royal executive decrees emanating from the homeland. The assertion of the right of self-government by the colonists, a denial of this principle by England and the arbitrary assumption of the right of Great Britain to make laws for all constituents of the English Empire without their right of participation or self-government, in each and every instance, led to the discovery by England that she had no right to make laws for the colonists in any respect whatsoever.[2]

This led to the Declaration of Independence by the Thirteen Colonies in which the basic and ever-underlying premise of American Government was emphasized, and that was that "* * * all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."[3]

These principles of (a) the inherent sovereignty of the people; and (b) the consequential creation of government to maintain these rights, deriving its powers from the consent of the governed, therefore gave rise to the Bill of Rights of the Thirteen Original States and thereafter the Bill of Rights to the United States Constitution.

It is seen that the doctrine of inherent sovereignty of the people is the major premise upon which this government was founded, and that very obviously all public officials are agents and agents only of the sovereign power, to wit, the people; and that consequently, the inherent right of self-government is always the primary right of the people:

The assertion of these rights by the American people gave rise to 7 years of merciless and bloody revolutionary war and incredible hardships, but was finally culminated by the independence of the American colonies climaxed by the surrender of General Cornwallis at Yorktown, October 19, 1781; and thereafter emerged the thirteen original colonies as free and independent states.

It is well to note that these states came into existence as separate governments and entities; and each retained all of the right of self-government, self-regulation, and all rights incident to complete sovereignty. They were independent of any other state or nation. Any problems, situations, improvements or social adjustments, all found adequate protection and comprehension within and by reason of the sovereign power of the individual state. None of these states was inadequate to determine fully on all matters of internal concern.

There were, however, certain limited problems that the people felt they were unable adequately to contend with. These inadequacies of the states acting as political units are stated by the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in its letter recommending to Congress the adoption of the new Federal Constitution. This letter is signed by George Washington and presents this limited state inadequacy as follows: "The friends of our country have long seen and desired, that the power of making war, peace and treaties; that of levying money and regulating commerce; and the corresponding executive and judicial authorities should be fully and effectively vested in the general government of the union."[4]

Throughout the debates in the Constitutional Convention was the constant insistence that in the dual system of Government about to be formulated, the rights and the sovereignty of the people and the States were to remain supreme in all matters of local and self government, but subject to certain powers to be expressly granted or delegated under the terms of the proposed Constitution to the proposed Federal Government.

And, the insistence of these principles in Convention debate was certainly not without precedents garnered from the rise and fall of government throughout history. Under the postulates of European monarchies and under the prerogatives of the Roman civil law, the state or government is exemplified as all-powerful, all-knowing, all-wise and even of divine origin. A corollary of this premise was it therefore became the duty of the government, that in order to achieve supreme success and happiness for the people, the state or government must obviously regulate and prescribe for all human endeavors, and that the deity of the state naturally denied the right of the individual to work out his own problems, and to prescribe his own methods of procedure. This theory of government postulated from the time of the disintegration of the Roman republic at the time of the formation of the first triumvirate, approximately 50 years before Christ, found expression and was fully bearing fruit at the time of the American Constitutional Convention. The European theory advocated that the government of monarchy and dictatorship was all-knowing and all-powerful, and was predicated on the premise that the people whom it sought to govern were utterly incapable of governing themselves and prescribing their own rules and regulations. Its purpose was that of dictating to and for the lives of its peoples.

Consequently, at the Constitutional Convention, it was the considered opinion of the members of the Convention that the state was not divine nor omnipotent nor omniscient, but that, on the contrary, sovereignty, law and regulation were rights of the people, and that the official was but an agent of the people placed in office for the purpose of administering laws enacted by the people, and that every individual had the right without the interference or intermeddling of government to formulate his own happiness and his own laws.

Accordingly, with the ever-retained sovereign rights of the people as the major premise, there was formulated the United States Constitution (September 17, 1787) retaining all rights of the States and inherent rights of the people in statu quo, except such powers as were therein expressly given and delegated to the Federal Government. Under the Federal Constitution there are created three separate and distinct departments of government. Article I creates and delegates power to the legislative or congressional department; under article II there is created and delegated power to the executive department; and under article III there is created and delegated power to the judicial department. Each department of government, under this novel system, is supreme within its own field, but, nevertheless, acts as a check-balance upon the other departments.

Although the sovereignty of the people and the States, under the Constitution, as submitted and adopted in 1787, was clearly supreme, nevertheless the people were so zealous of these unalienable rights and fearful of the usurpation of power by the Federal Government and that tyranny under the pretense of constitutional authorization might become enthroned, that the Thirteen States thereafter adopted, in 1791, the ninth and tenth amendments to the Federal Constitution. These amendments again reaffirmed the limitations of the Federal Government and the sovereign rights of the States and the people as independent political units. These amendments at the time seemed to satisfy the minds of the most skeptic, and were thought to definitely and finally put to an end the respective rights and any possible contentions that might arise under the relative rights of the dual government.

Article I, section 8, of the Federal Constitution enumerates 18 specific grants of power by the people to the United States Congress. Among these grants there may be listed the following fundamental rights affecting the life and liberty of the people of the country:

1. The power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;
2. To pay the debts of the United States;
3. To provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;
4. To borrow money on the credit of the United States;
5. To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes;
6. To coin money and regulate the value thereof and fix the standards of weights and measures;
7. To declare war;
8. To raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a Navy;
9. The power to make treaties under the authority of the United States (art. VI, sec. 2).

At this time it should be noted that the American system of government was entirely the creation of the American people and American way of life, and that under the Federal Constitution one of the purposes was to eliminate the doctrine of an all-powerful legislature as well as an equally powerful administrative or executive division. Under the English law neither division of government was subject to any judicial control. Hence both operated independently, exclusively, and to a great extent, without restraint and without restraint upon each other.

To obviate any such situation in this country there was incorporated in our Constitution and created the United States Supreme Court with power to determine all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The Supreme Court was set up as a bastion against the encroachment by the legislative or executive branches of the Government against each other or by them against the sovereign rights retained by the people, and consequently to prevent any arbitrary, unlawful, or self-assumed power by either the executive or legislative branches of the Government.

It was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the Supreme Court be established nonpartisan, free and independent, and beyond the pressure of any whim and caprice of public factionalism, fanaticism, public clamor, or the platitudes of the masses. The Court was established to be an all-time bulwark against such pressures and against infractions of the Constitution, however minor or serious, that might occur, and for the purpose also of declaring null and void any usurpations of power or encroachments that might occur by either the legislative or administrative branches of the Federal Government. For this reason the Supreme Court was placed beyond all approach and appointed for life.

The constitutional principle of complete sovereignty of the people, and that the States operated as independent political units, and that the Federal Government existed by reason of a grant of powers by the people was thereafter respected for at least 100 years. Under the protection of these principles and the establishment of this dual system of government, the United States became the freest and the most stable Government in the world. The liberty enjoyed by the citizens of this country was unequaled and unparalleled from the earliest records of organized society, dating back at least 4,000 years B. C., up to and including the present time.

It would be well to note at this time, however, that in the year 1819, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, speaking through Chief Justice Marshall enunciated a principle obviously necessary to a proper construction of that case, but which later served as a yardstick for the unwarranted assumption by Congress of vast powers never intended by the framers of the Constitution nor by the States subscribing thereto. This doctrine, simple at the time of its creation, was as follows:

"There were to be implied to the Federal Government all powers necessary to the exercise of the enumerated powers to the Federal Government."[5]

However, with some deviations, this principle McCulloch v. Maryland was strictly adhered to and powers that could not be truly and honestly considered as powers necessarily implied from the specific grants of power to Congress was not enlarged (License Cases, 5 Howard, 46 U. S. 504 (1847), and the American Government flourished and progressed under the dual system of government, as contemplated by the Federal Constitution.

Indeed, even after the war of the rebellion in 1866, during times of the greatest internal and national stress ever faced by the United States, in affirming the elementary principles of the Federal Constitution and the sovereignty of the people of the States, the Supreme Court states in ex parte Milligan[6] as follows:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory on which it is based is false; for government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence; as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

However, from approximately 1887, the Supreme Court, slowly at first but thereafter during the years gaining momentum, enlarged by judicial construction the authority of the Congress of the United States and decreed as valid acts of Congress on the premise and ground that such legislation was a proper and necessary implied power to an express grant of power to Congress under the Constitution. The decision of the Supreme Court in Bowman v. The Chicago Railway Company (125 U. S. 465 (1887)), indicates the beginning of this trend of construction enhancing the implied powers of Congress. In this case the legislature of the State of Iowa, acting under the police powers and the sovereign rights of the people, had decreed that common carriers bringing intoxicating liquors into the State must first obtain a certificate from State authorities.

The enactment by the legislature of this law was necessary to adequately enforce the policy of State prohibition against the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor.

The desires of the people of the State of Iowa in this regard were swept aside by the Supreme Court in this decision, and the State legislation nullified insofar as this case was concerned, the Supreme Court, in construing the implied powers of Congress and the powers of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, held that the Iowa Legislature violated implied powers granted to Congress under the commerce clause, and states in part as follows: "The statute of Iowa * * * (requiring a certificate) is essentially a regulation of commerce among the States within any differentiation given to that term or which can be given; and although its motive and purpose are to perfect the policy of the State of Iowa in protecting its citizens against the evils of intemperance, it is nonetheless on that act a regulation of commerce." And so this State legislation and desires of the people of the State of Iowa were nullified and terminated.

This trend, however, toward liberal and enlarged construction of (implied) powers of Congress saw through the ensuing years, however, sporadic but continuous enlargement. As vacancies occurred, obviously personnel on the Court changed. There were also, however, placed upon the Supreme Court conservative lawyers and students of the Constitution and men studied in the fundamental principles of American government.

One of the greatest exponents of American constitutional Government, as contemplated by the American Constitution and the American way of life, was Justice David J. Brewer, who was a member of this distinguished bench from 1890 to 1910. One of his decisions standing out as a milestone in United States jurisprudence and coming at a time in which the trend of the court was and had been for some time toward liberal construction of legislative powers was the decision rendered in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S. 46 (1906)), in which he states, on behalf of the court, that the United States Government is one of enumerated powers and has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that this enumeration is to be found only in the United States Constitution, and that if Congress seeks new powers, it should be obtained as provided in the Constitution, and that the reservation and the reaffirmance of the rights of the people and the States, as set forth in the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution, are to be construed in simple English and are to mean what they say, and that "the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a government of enumerated powers. That this is such a government clearly appears from the Constitution independently of the amendments. * * * This natural construction of the * * * Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted." [7]

This decision again reaffirmed and reestablished principles of constitutional government, but not for long. The doctrine of implied powers was again to be reaffirmed by the Supreme Court soon thereafter and in no uncertain fashion. Numerous decisions thereafter followed over a period of years and down to the present time which have opened the gates with increasing acceleration to Federal legislation and to administrative acts of the executive department in a manner never contemplated or comprehended by the States ratifying the Constitution, by the framers of the Constitution, or by the Constitution itself.

WARTIME PROHIBITION ACT

In 1919 this drift from the Constitution again became apparent. On November 21, 1918, there was enacted the Wartime Prohibition Act (40 Stat. 1046). This was approved 10 days after the armistice with Germany was signed. It provided that until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization it was unlawful to sell alcoholic beverages. The act stated that this was for the purpose of conserving manpower. It is to be noted that under the grants of power to Congress there is no right given to legislate on the question of prohibition, and that if this legislation is a valid exercise of legislative power it would have to be affirmed as an "implied power" incidental to a direct grant of power to Congress. It is to be noted that this legislation was enacted after the capitulation of Germany and the signing of the armistice. However, the Supreme Court affirmed this legislation of Congress and held this legislation a "war power"—a power of Congress arising under its right to declare war and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" [8] the powers expressly granted. This appears to be the first time that reference is had to "war powers" of the United States, powers that arise by implication from express grants of power to the Federal Legislature.

This decision opened the door to limitless legislation by Congress on the theory that legislation was justifiable as a war power. A right or power of Congress to enact legislation derived from the direct power to declare war and to enact such legislation as may be necessary to enforce the same.

The vicious part of this unbridled power is that these war powers are not confined to a period of time at which the country is actually engaged in a state of war. Let us examine further.

HOUSING AND RENT ACT, 1947

There was passed by Congress, effective July 1, 1947, and practically 2 years after the complete capitulation of Japan, what was known as the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, effective July 1, 1947, regulating the maximum price of rents to be charged under the authority of the Housing Administrator. The constitutionality of this litigation was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court [9] as valid legislation of Congress under their "war powers." And it is to be noted that in affirming the Housing Act of 1947, the Court cites with approval and authority the decision rendered in 1919 in Hamilton against the Kentucky Distilleries Co., supra, as its precedent, and concludes that "the war power includes the power 'to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress' and continues for the duration of that emergency. Whatever may be the consequences when war is officially terminated, the war power does not necessarily end with the cessation of hostilities." And most significant is this statement of the Court: "But we canot assume that Congress is not alert to its constitutional responsibilities." [10] In connection with this statement, it is well to remember that the Supreme Court is and was to act as a bastion and bulwark against the encroachment by Congress upon any other departments of the Government or the Constitution itself. The history of congressional legislation indicates to the contrary, and that Congress has time and again directed legislative mandates contrary to its power, and that on such occasions it has not been alerted to its constitutional responsibilities, and that the Supreme Court has had to vitiate and set aside such acts of Congress.

In this holding (Woods against Miller Co., supra), there is a concurring opinion, written by Justice Jackson who, while affirming the legality of the legislation, nevertheless views the same with great concern and skepticism, declaring that "the Government asserts no constitutional basis for this legislation other than this vague, undefined and undefinable 'war power.' No one will question that this power is the most dangerous one to free government in the whole catalog of powers." At the time of the present writing, it is 5 years and 4 months since Japan completely capitulated and under the guise of war powers, the Federal Government has and is enacting legislation not authorized under the Federal Constitution nor possible of conscientious construction as a "war power" of Congress.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

One of the greatest detours from the Constitution is to be found in the construction of implied powers to Congress resulting from the grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce among the States. This big step was made in the sanctioning of Federal legislation by the Supreme Court in a divided opinion rendered in 1935 in the case of Ashwander v. The Tennessee Valley Authority (297 U. S. 288). This decision literally and actually put the Federal Government into the business of distributing and selling electric power over large districts and to expel companies which had long serviced them and the control of the markets therein. This with all the protective rights of the sovereign and subject to no limitations whatsoever. A brief résumé of the history of this litigation and the ultimate finding of the Supreme Court is illuminating and the full import of its decision startling and amazing.

The Tennessee River is approximately 900 miles in length. The drainage basin approximately 40,000 square miles; the volume of water is extremely variable; commercial navigation is of moderate importance. However, during and immediately after World War I, there was constructed at Muscle Shoals, near Florence, Ala., the Wilson Dam. With its auxiliary plants, including the hydroelectric power plant, they were intended to be adapted to the purpose of national defense. Also, the act authorizing the creation of the same, the Defense Act of June 3, 1916, had in view improvements to navigation. As a result of this, the Federal production of electricity soon commenced. Some was devoted to Government purposes; much was sold but delivery made at or near the dam.

On May 18, 1933, Congress created a corporation, known as the Tennessee Valley Authority, and operations were begun for improving the Tennessee River navigation, and especially for developing the water power along the whole river at public expense. This plan involved conversion of water power into electricity for wide distribution throughout the valley and adjacent territory.

The United States Government immediately thereafter acting through its creation, the Tennessee Valley Authority, promptly took over the Wilson Dam; construction work began on the Wheeler Dam, 20 miles up the river; and the Pickwick Dam, some 40 miles lower down. It commenced construction on the Norris Dam, across the Clinch River, a branch of the Tennessee River 200 miles above the Wilson Dam. All of these additions were to be connected by transmission wires, and electric energy distributed from them to millions of people in many States.[11]

At this time it is to be noted that during the last 30 years (prior to 1935), several corporations had been engaged in the business of developing electrical energy. It finally resulted in an extensive business having been built up; all private corporations, of course, and operated under State supervision. Among them were the Alabama Power Co., Georgia Power Co., Mississippi Power Co., and the Tennessee Electric Power Co. They were ultimately banded together under the mother company of the Commonwealth and Southern Corp. During this time and during the creation of these big private enterprises, huge sums of money were invested by thousands of persons in many States of the Union, and the companies were at all times diligently developing their several systems in response to the demands of the people in the territories that they served.

The creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority was to put the United States Government into the business of distributing and selling electric power through the same districts serviced by the aforementioned private power companies, and to expel the power companies which had long serviced them and to control the market therein.[12]

The question before the Supreme Court was that the Tennessee Valley Authority was not properly created nor authorized by any express grant of power or right to Congress, nor were the rights assuming to be exercised by Congress in the creation of the Authority proper incidental powers to be derived from any express power granted Congress.

The majority opinion in affirming this Federal legislation held "the act of 1916 had in view improvements to navigation. Commerce includes navigation. The power to regulate interstate commerce embodies the power to keep the navigable rivers of the United States free from obstructions to navigation and to remove such obstructions when they exist. The Government acquired full title to the dam site, with all riparian rights. The power of falling water was an inevitable incident to the construction of the dam. That water came into exclusive control of the Federal Government. The mechanical energy was convertible into electric energy, and the electric energy thus produced constitutes property belonging to the United States."

By this construction the Government was put into active competition, with all the exemptions of sovereignty, with private enterprise, which was subject to all of the burdens of government and of sovereignty.

A very capable dissenting opinion is written by Justice McReynolds in which it is pointed out that the public service corporations which were and had been servicing the millions of people in many States were to be brought to such terms as the Valley Authority saw fit to dictate, or to be put out of business, and that an early expenditure for this purpose of public funds of at least $75,000,000 was appropriated by the directors for this purpose. The purpose of the Valley Authority was definitely to control the market of selling and distributing electric power heretofore serviced by private companies. And the dissenting opinion clearly points out that "a Government instrumentality had entered upon a pretentious scheme to provide a yardstick to the fairness of rates charged by private owners and to attain no less a goal than the electrification of America."

Under the competition of Federal enterprise tax free and subject to no limitation other than the sovereign may desire to prescribe for itself, and free from any State limitation whatsoever, it is clear that the power companies, operating under the name of the Commonwealth & Southern Corp., were either to be forced into bankruptcy, or to comply with the pleasures of the Valley Authority. They chose the latter.

The Alabama Power Co. agreed to sell for $1,000,000 all of its low-tension transmission lines, substations, and all rural lines in five Alabama counties and parts of two others.

The Mississippi Power Co., for $350,000, agreed to transfer all of its transmission and distribution lines, substations and generating plants in nine counties in the State of Mississippi to the Authority.

For $900,000, the Tennessee Power Co. agreed to convey its transmission and distribution lines, substations, and distribution system in four counties in Tennessee and all of the 66 kilovolt transmission lines from Cove Creek to Knoxville, Tenn., to the Valley Authority.

Justice McReynolds in his conclusion states that "Congress has no constitutional authority to authorize the Tennessee Valley Authority or any other Federal agency to undertake the operation essentially permanent in character of a utility system for profit, involving the generation, transmission, and commercial distribution of electricity within State domain, having no reasonable relation to a lawful Government use." He further states, "if under the thin mask of disposing of property the United States can enter the business of generating * * * and selling power * * * with the definite design to accompany industry wholly beyond the sphere marked out from time to time by the Constitution, an easy way has been found for breaking down the limitations * * * to guarantee protection against aggression."

Clearly, the holding of the majority of the Supreme Court constitutes constitutional amendment by judicial legislation. Now for a step further and as a natural consequence of the breakdown of constitutional barriers, let us analyze the holdings of the Court in its construction of the commerce clause to be found in the case of Wickard v. Filburn (317 U. S. 111) decided some 7 years later (1942).

At this time there had been adopted by Congress the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. It was amended in 1941, and this case has to do with the amendment of 1941. In this case the defendant, Filburn, had for many years owned and operated a small farm in Ohio. From this farm he obtained his living by selling cattle, milk, and raising poultry. To keep the farm operating properly, he raised a small acreage of winter wheat, which when sown in the fall was ready for harvest in July. Of this small amount of wheat, he would sell a portion of the crop to feed part of the poultry and livestock; another portion of the crop he used for home consumption; the rest of the crop he kept for seeding for the ensuing year. Under the terms of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, an order was issued limiting Filburn to 11.1 acres for the raising of wheat and each acre not to yield more than 20.1 bushels of wheat. Apparently, finding that he could not adequately operate his small farm on this arbitrary allotment, he planted and sowed 23 acres of his land with wheat and harvested from the excess acreage sown (11.9 acres), excess bushels in the number of 239. Under the terms of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, he was now subject to a penalty of 49 cents a bushel, or $117.11, and because of his refusal or inability to pay the penalty, he was refused a marketing card. Obviously the effect of this was to put him out of business.

The question of the constitutionality of this act was presented to the Supreme Court and the Court affirmed the validity of the act on the ground that the act constituted a regulation of interstate commerce and as such was the exercise of a power authorized to Congress.

The validity of this act is justified by the Court in part in the following words: "The general scheme of the act is to control the volume moving in interstate and foreign commerce in order to avoid surpluses and shortages, and the consequent abnormal low or high wheat prices and obstructions to commerce."

The opinion also asserts the following conclusion of the Court: "The question (constitutionality of the act) would merit little consideration since our decisions in United States v. Darby (312 U. S. 100) sustaining the Federal power to regulate production of goods for commerce, except for the fact that this act extends Federal regulation to production not intended in any part for commerce but wholly for consumption on the farm." [13]

Can this be said to be anything other than judicial enlargement of constitutional powers? And what has happened to the dual system of government contemplated by the Constitution in the face of this holding and the rights of the States and the sovereign rights of the people clearly defined in the fundamental law?

Does it not bear out the admonition and the warning emanating from the dissenting opinion of Justice McKenna, in the case of Block v. Hirsch (254 U. S. 458), in which the majority opinion of the Supreme Court affirmed rent control of private property in the District of Columbia in 1921, in which Justice McKenna states "'withstand beginnings' (Boyd v. United States (116 U. S. 616)). Who can know to what end they will conduct? The facts of this litigation point the warning."

The decisions, of course, are replete with similar holdings on "implied" powers of Congress relative to the commerce clause. However, this trend of construction does not stop with the commerce clause. The same "liberal" attitude or drift is to be found in the construction by the Court of the power granted to Congress "the power to make treaties under the authority of the United States" (art. VI, sec. 2).

Under the guise of a treaty with Canada protecting migratory birds, an act of Congress which standing alone was manifestly unconstitutional [14] now became the law of the land (Missouri v. Holland (252 U. S. 416), opinion by Justice Holmes. But the consequence of this holding and subsequent holdings is so very far-reaching and so transcends constitutional grants that they can only be adequately treated in a separate discussion.

NINTH AND TENTH AMENDMENTS BEING NULLIFIED

And so it is clearly apparent that the inherent and sovereign rights of the people and the States, recognized and guaranteed in the ninth and tenth amendments of the Constitution have been inched away by congressional usurpation of power and authority, and that legislative exercise of power in this respect has been affirmed by the supreme tribunal.

The great danger to be found in the wake of such expansion and centralization of power is totalitarianism and dictatorship. History is replete with the rise of false prophets motivated only by political success and desire for personal grandeur and personal enthronement, who through the usurpation of powers, will play to the platitudes of the masses and under the postulates of democracy will not hesitate to seize power and ultimately annihilate the sovereign rights of the people. A most casual analysis of the Hitler regime, the Mussolini dictatorship, the present Stalin bureaucracy advocating the alleged supremacy of the proletariat, illustrates nicely and comprehensively the complete assassination of sovereign rights and free enterprise, and the consequential results of the doctrine of unlimited powers of Federal Government.

Such a situation and such contingencies and uncertainties were most comprehendingly discussed by President William Harrison in 1841, in succeeding to the Presidency and after the expiration of the office of Andrew Jackson. In his only message to Congress, after pointed comments in regard to the powers assumed by Andrew Jackson, he follows with this observation:

"This is the old trick of those who usurp the government of their country. In the name of democracy they speak, warning the people against the influence of wealth and the danger of aristocracy. History, ancient and modern, is full of such examples. Caesar became the master of the Roman people and the senate under the pretense of supporting the democratic claims of the former against the aristocracy of the latter; Cromwell, in the character of the protector of the liberties of the people, became the dictator of England, and Bolivar possessed himself of unlimited power with the title of his country's liberator. * * * The tendencies of all such governments in their decline is to monarchy, and the antagonistic principle to liberty there is spirit of faction—a spirit which assumes the character and in times of great excitement imposes itself upon the people as the genuine spirit of freedom, and, like the false christs whose coming was foretold by the Saviour, seeks to, and were it possible, would impose upon the true and most faithful disciples of liberty. It is in periods like this that it behooves the people to be most watchful of those to whom they have entrusted power."

POLAND SOLD OUT AT YALTA

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRIEST). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, the month of February brings to mind many dates of which the American people are justly proud, such as Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays.

However, this week marks the anniversary of a date on which America can lower her head in shame. We are not proud to remember that 6 years ago the now infamous Yalta agreement was drawn up by the architects of our present foreign policy, one of the chief advisers being Alger Hiss.

Yesterday marked the day that the Democratic Party, the Hisses, the New Deal, the Fair Deal—yes, even the "queer deal"—sold Poland into slavery and paved the way for the enslavement of eight more European nations and permitted the Soviet Empire to become a great world force. They turned the Polish people over to communism; they covered up the facts of the Katyn massacre for many years where many thousands of Polish officers were wantonly massacred: they put religion on the chopping block to such an extent that the feature news story in last Sunday's Catholic News reported:

"The curtailments suffered by the church in Poland during 1950 were among the worst in its 1,000-year history."

In my own city of Chicago the great majority of Polish people in the past have supported the Democratic Party. Why does not the Democratic Party demand just treatment and renounce the sell-out of Poland? Why does not this Democratic Party right the wrongs of Yalta? Why? Because they will not admit their own blunders, and it will have to remain for the Republican Party to restore decency and confidence in our foreign relations, and to restore Poland to its rightful place among the great nations of the world.

THE BOXCAR SITUATION IN THE MIDWEST

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, the boxcar situation throughout the Midwest is again becoming very bad and especially has it been aggravated by the switchmen's strike. I have today introduced H. R. 2517, which would give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to regulate the rental charges on boxcars which, for example, leave our area in the Midwest with a load of grain or lumber for an eastern destination. Eastern lines then used these cars day after day instead of returning them immediately to their home railroads in the West and Midwest. Consequently, at times, some of our railroads in the Midwest have 30 percent of their boxcars doing shuttle service at $1.75 a day on the eastern lines, instead of being returned for another long haul. By raising the rental to a reasonable figure, the Interstate Commerce Commission can regulate the use of these cars and prevent chaotic conditions occurring periodically in the great grain-producing areas of our Nation. I hope the membership will help in getting this legislation adopted. It will save from spoilage and wastage millions of bushels of high-moisture-content grain annually.

TWO RELATED INCIDENTS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, two events took place yesterday which should have a definite relation with each other in the minds of the American public.

One was the successful effort of the Republican minority to achieve a greater degree of realism in the reciprocal trade agreements program; and the other, the conviction in New York City of William W. Remington for perjury involving denial of his Communist affiliations.

While I do not charge that the negotiation of trade agreements with other countries, handled or at least dominated by the State Department, has been dictated by unpatriotic motives, the evidence is conclusive that disloyal elements have wormed their way into this crucial governmental activity. Certainly, case after case can be cited where the United States negotiators displayed far deeper concern over the welfare of foreign industries and those employed in them than they did over American businesses and American working men and women.

International trade is vitally important to the prosperity and well being of the people of this country. If trade agreements are conscientiously arrived at and scrupulously administered in accordance with the protective provisions now incorporated in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and all parties concerned sincerely bend their efforts toward making it work, many of the evils and injustices which have resulted from the present program can be eliminated without impairment, indeed with an increase in the volume of international trade flowing in both directions.

It is regrettable that the attitude of the administration leaders who sponsored the bill before us yesterday made it necessary to water down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] to withdraw the application of reduced tariffs and other concessions which have been granted to imports from Russia, Red China and other Communist dominated countries. At least the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means did succeed in convincing the Majority that they should not throw a road block in the way of the effort to stop the State Department from championing the grant of such concessions to Communist countries in the future.

Probably no one in Congress knows what goes on behind the scenes in preparation for these international trade conferences or what takes place at the conferences themselves. Contrary to the practice of other countries, Members of the United States Congress are excluded from participation in these conclaves.

We do know that in many instances damaging, sometimes fatal, concessions have been made by our representatives. We also know that the personnel of some of our negotiators was, in many instances, not such as to commend them to the confidence of the American people.

The insidious influence of Alger Hiss in international conferences has been repeatedly emphasized. Now we have the case of William W. Remington, who stands convicted of having lied when he said he was not a member of the Communist Party.

It is important for us to remember, and for the American public constantly to bear in mind, the high official positions which Remington held and the influence upon international trade matters which he necessarily exerted. Let me refresh your recollection as to the high posts in Government which he held.

When he testified in July of 1948 before the Senate Committee on Expenditures, he had previously been a staff member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers with offices in the White House and the assistant executive secretary of a committee headed by Mr. Harriman, with offices in the White House, and was at that time the director of the export program staff of the Office of International Trade, Department of Commerce. In this last capacity he was directly under Mr. Thomas C. Blaisdell, the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for foreign and domestic commerce.

It should not be necessary for the Congress of the United States to be required by legislation to direct, as they did yesterday, that the executive agencies shall endeavor to protect American interests when they negotiate trade treaties and that they shall not grant reduced tariffs and other concessions to Communist-controlled countries. But unfortunately, bitter experience has dictated the necessity for such protective amendments.

On the very day Congress steps in to protect American interests, a dramatic illustration of one of the reasons for this action is furnished by this conviction in a court of law of one of our highest placed experts in international trade.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman stated something about an amendment being adopted yesterday by the Republican minority. Did not that amendment receive support from the majority side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not state a parliamentary inquiry. The RECORD speaks for itself, as to what took place on the floor of the House.

THE TREASURY AND THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, in the current controversy between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board it is the people who are getting burned. One of the things we said about this emergency was that there was not to be business as usual or politics as usual. I think it is time to end politics in this situation and have the Treasury and Federal Reserve Board get together to answer these questions: Shall the interest on the national debt be a billion or so dollars less, which makes the budget look better; or shall inflation be dealt a real blow by dealing with the inflationary expansion of bank credit at its source? Let us remember that such inflation can cost our people many times in billions of dollars of purchasing power what additional expenditure would be involved in somewhat higher interest rates on some Government bond issues.

Normally the people are entitled to low-interest rates and that is in the long-range interest of the United States. We are in grave danger from inflation now and reasonable people will not object to measures to halt it so that we may indeed again be able to take up the forward march to normal economic conditions and low interest rates. But if one of these parties wins an absolute victory—and that is the Treasury—they are going to go off in one direction without the Federal Reserve Board with what may well prove a disservice to the people. The time has come for compromise, we need the Treasury and Federal Reserve Board unified on policy. It would be a service to the people if the President "called off the dogs" and both parties got together and inflation attributable to vast additions to the money supply and public credit was dealt a body blow now. The people will understand that saving somewhat on interest payments on national debt in such circumstances would be penny wise and pound foolish.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRIEST). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, for several decades it has been evident that the St. Lawrence seaway and power project will make a substantial addition to the economic strength of Canada and the United States. By removing the narrow bottleneck—created by rapids in the St. Lawrence River—between Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Montreal—a distance of 114 miles—a 2,347-mile deepwater channel between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean will be opened. Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Toledo, Duluth, and other Great Lakes cities will become ocean ports. Great transportation savings will result throughout the area when the midwest finally receives its Panama Canal.

As part of the dual-purpose development of the St. Lawrence River, a power project, the equivalent of a Grand Coulee, will be made available. The site of this power development is at Massena, N. Y. Shared equally by Canada and the United States, the 13,000,000,000-kilowatt-hours of electric energy generated annually will go far to alleviate the critical power situation facing Eastern Canada and the New York-New England region.

The present legislation calls for the project to be self-liquidating. Tolls are to be charged on the waterway. The State of New York is to pay for the power facilities, which will be turned over to that State. Thus, the taxpayers do not bear the ultimate burden of the costs of the St. Lawrence development.

The present world crisis serves to emphasize the urgency of getting started on the St. Lawrence project. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Joint Board for Defense, Canada and the United States, and the Defense Department, have all taken the view that the St. Lawrence development is needed for the security of Canada and the United States.

But most important of all to our national security is the need for the St. Lawrence seaway to provide a protected waterway to transport Labrador iron ore to Great Lakes steel mills.

Over a 50-year period, and through two world wars, the mines around Lake Superior have supplied most of the Nation's iron ore. But now, the huge reserves of high-grade ore in the area are seriously depleted. The demands of the present mobilization period will make new inroads on our declining domestic reserves of ore. By 1960 we shall be forced to import a very substantial portion of the iron ore required by our steel mills. Labrador ore provides the only major continental source of high-grade ore to supplement our dwindling domestic supplies.

The St. Lawrence seaway is urgently needed to make it possible to bring Labrador iron ore in over a protected inland route rather than over exposed ocean routes, subject to enemy submarine attack.

Moreover, the inexpensive waterway transportation will have a stabilizing effect on industry in the Middle West. If the seaway is not constructed, the steel industry and associated industries will tend to migrate to coastal areas to take advantage of cheap tidewater transportation of foreign iron ores. The resulting economic decline of the Midwest, and the further concentration of industry on our exposed East and Gulf coasts, will adversely affect the security of the Nation.

Both the power and navigation facilities of the St. Lawrence project are urgently needed for the national security of Canada and the United States. Further delay in undertaking the St. Lawrence project must not be tolerated.

CONVICTION OF WILLIAM W. REMINGTON

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, another red herring has finally been laid to rest. This time it is the case of William W. Remington, the $10,000-a-year Commerce Department economist who was found guilty last night of perjury. What the verdict amounts to, of course, is a finding that Remington has been a member of the gang of Communist spies, saboteurs, and traitors in high Government positions who have been serving the cause of Russia for many years.

We should draw two lessons from the Remington verdict. First, it is a sad commentary on the President's so-called loyalty program. In February 1949, many months after espionage charges had been made against Remington, the President's Loyalty Review Board cleared him and awarded him $5,000 in back pay to cover the period of his suspension. One of the many astounding aspects of the Board's action was the later admission by its chairman, Seth Richardson, that it had never bothered to study the testimony about Remington that had been developed by a Senate investigating committee during the Eightieth Congress, even after that testimony had been transmitted to the Board for its especial consideration. This Mr. Richardson is, of course, the same man whom Mr. Truman has recently nominated to be chairman of the new Subversive Activities Control Board. By this action in the Remington case alone, Mr. Richardson has disqualified himself for any such important position.

The second lesson from the Remington verdict is that it proves the importance of the work of congressional investigating committees in ferreting out disloyalty. The Remington case was developed in its early stages by the House Un-American Activities Committee, as was the Alger Hiss case. Luckily, these committees did not believe that the stench from the Remington and other cases were just the odor of "red herring," as President Truman wise-cracked repeatedly.

EFFICIENT USE OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, General Marshall and his advisers are advocating that Congress approve legislation for the drafting of 18-year-olds. This legislation might not be necessary and veterans of World War II would not be recalled to active duty if the Department of Defense would only use the available manpower efficiently and economically.

A recent communication from a GI on duty clearly indicates the Army is not doing the job effectively. A corporal was recalled to active duty in November. He spent 2 weeks at Fort Sheridan in Illinois. From there he was shipped to Tacoma, Wash., where he remained 2 weeks. Then a shift back east to Percy Jones Hospital in Battle Creek, Mich., for duty. Approximately a month later he received orders to report to his new duty, back again at Tacoma, Wash.

This GI will have traveled approximately 10,000 miles in 3 months. From Fort Sheridan, Ill., to Battle Creek, Mich., is about 140 miles but under Army orders he traveled to the west coast and back again.

The American people need to have confidence in the Department of Defense, but they are properly disturbed by such unsound personnel policies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to address the House for 90 minutes on Wednesday next, following the disposition of the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

NEWS REPORTS AND COMMENTARIES FREE OF LABOR INFLUENCE

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a copy of a bill I am today introducing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill that has for its purpose the preservation to the American public of its right to news reports and commentaries, free from the influence that can be exerted by national labor organizations upon their membership.

Under this measure I propose to exclude from the provisions of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1947, as amended, all employees of newspapers or periodicals, and all others, directly involved in gathering and presentation of marketed public information.

Freedom of the press is one of our constitutional guaranties, recognized as vital to our national security. However, it cannot be contradicted that no real freedom of the press can exist, no complete honesty of presentation can be assured, and no genuine, well-founded public confidence can be reposed in reportorial accuracy if individuals who develop and phrase news that shapes public opinion are subject to economic pressure from sources having vital and widely varied interest in news content.

It would seem obvious that the news reporter under the impression his working conditions have been or could be improved by membership in a union through its affiliation with a national labor organization or who can, under certain circumstances, be deprived of his means of livelihood under the rules of such organization cannot fail to be influenced in some degree by reason of the relationship.

Sound public policy demands forthright presentation of news. The American press must function freely, safe from even the suspicion of undercover utilization of power over reportorial staffs by labor organizations for the purpose of directing public thought through news coloration nor should even the suspicion exist that such organizations could, through friendly relations established by mutual interests restrict or prevent publication of unfavorable information.

Public policy has decreed that Federal, State and municipal employees be excluded from the provisions of the act. Surely to no less a degree can exclusion be justified of that group that is charged with the great responsibility of reporting the news for public consumption on which the opinions formed by our American citizenry are predicated.

The fourth estate has its proud traditions. It constitutes a field of service that affords great opportunity and attracts men and women of exceptional talent. Its very nature and its exacting requirements insures for them adequate compensation and fair working conditions. Clearly, an alliance of newsmen with any organization having a vital selfish interest in news content is contrary to public interest and a departure from traditional reportorial independence.

It should be made clear that this bill is not to be interpreted as accusatory in the sense that it is prompted by the back record. The intent is purely to safeguard to the greatest possible degree vital public interest in open-minded news presented.

My bill reads as follows:

H. R. 2516

A bill to deny the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act to any labor organization whose membership includes certain employees of newspapers and periodicals

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(i) No investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by a labor organization under subsection (c) of this section, no petition filed by a labor organization under section 9 (e) (1) shall be entertained, and no complaint shall be issued pursuant to a charge made by a labor organization under subsection (b) of section 10, if such labor organization is an affiliate or constituent unit of any national or international labor organization and includes among its officers or members any individual employed by a newspaper or other periodical as a writer, reporter, correspondent, or commentator, or in any other capacity which is directly involved in the gathering or presentation of news."

PACKED APPROPRIATION SUBCOMMITTEES

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the Appropriations Committee met yesterday and organized 1 month after the organization of the House. I want to call the attention of the House to one of the most shocking examples of packing committees that I have ever witnessed in my 28 years in Congress.

Although the historic ratio between majority and minority members has been 3 to 2, the Democrats yesterday packed two subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee at a 5-to-2 ratio, and three other subcommittees at 4-to-2 ratio.

I want to call attention to the fact that the five committees which have been stacked are committees where any substantial savings in the budget this year must be made. With Republicans having 46 percent of the membership of the House, it is impossible for me to reconcile the fact that we received only 29 percent representation on two committees and only 33⅓ percent representation on three others.

I can only conclude that it is the intention of the committee chairman, Mr. CANNON, and the Democratic leadership of this House to ignore public demand for economy and to protect the bureaucrats in their spend-as-usual programs. If Mr. CANNON wants to be the pallbearer for the Democratic Party, who am I to stop him? I can only tell this House that the Republican members will work with all the energy they possess to hold every non-defense-appropriation item to only essentials. But I must tell the House that Republicans cannot be held responsible for appropriations voted by stacked committees.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, as members of the Subcommittee on State, Justice, Commerce, and Judiciary Appropriations, my colleague from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER] and myself find that subcommittee has been stacked against us 5 to 2. For the life of me, I cannot understand what the chairman and the Democratic members of the committee hope to gain by such tactics. I know that the people of my district, and I am confident that the entire population of this country, want a maximum of economy, particularly in nondefense items, during this crisis when they are asked to submit to taxes until it hurts.

There is simply no justification for this arbitrary action unless it be that the Democratic Party wants to commit suicide. If the Democratic Party wishes to extinguish itself, it has picked a certain way to do it because the responsibility for any extravagance during this critical year will lie squarely on that party.

As a member of the committee, I will, of course, spend every hour that I can in efforts to effect the economies that we must have if this Nation is to remain secure, and I know that I express the sentiment of all 20 Republican members of the Appropriations Committee. But I cannot accept responsibility when I am not permitted to share in it.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, as a member of one of the committees that has in effect been stacked 5 to 2 in favor of reckless spending, I rise to join the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN] in this protest. We on the subcommittee for the Interior have worked long hours in the past to do the best job possible. What justification there can be for this procedure, short of protecting the bureaucrats and spenders, I do not know. I will promise the House this much: My colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON] and myself will do the best we can, even though we may be outvoted 5 to 2, and I further promise that if substantial reductions are not made—and I have very little hope that they will be made—we will bring amendments to the floor that will give this House—with its 54–46-percent ratio representation—a chance to do the job.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I think the comments made by the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TABER] and other Republican members of that committee today are of interest to everybody in the entire United States. They show an organization plan in the committee which can be directed to only one thing; that is, to the protection of spending as against saving.

I am also interested in the fact that the Subcommittee on Agriculture, a basic commodity of the United States, a great industry of the United States, is to be placed by the committee chairman and the majority members of the Committee on Appropriations in the same category as the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I protested to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] against treating the Subcommittee on Agriculture in that fashion yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

SUBVERSIVES

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago reference was made to the Remington and Hiss cases. Both Remington and Hiss were cleared by loyalty boards. These cases bring to my mind another case.

I refer to the case of George Shaw Wheeler, a man whose record I exposed on this floor several years ago. I was severely criticized and smeared at the time because it was stated that the man had been cleared by three loyalty boards. A little over a year ago this same man repudiated the United States and sought asylum behind the iron curtain under Russian protection. A man who was educated in this country and given every opportunity the same as any other citizen repudiated the country of his birth and the land that gave him opportunity and education.

This brings me to another point. This Nation does not yet know the debt of gratitude we owe the able and distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, Hon. JOHN RANKIN, for the part he played in establishing the Committee on Un-American Activities. That committee examined the records of Alger Hiss and Remington and their questionable connections. The function of this committee is to examine the records of people of this type for security reasons, and it has done excellent and valuable work.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, the conviction of William Remington for perjury in connection with his membership in the Communist Party has another lesson which I think ought to be pointed out. It has to do with the reliability of Miss Elizabeth Bentley, Whittaker Chambers, and Louis Budenz. These three individuals, against whom every possible smear has been directed in an effort to discredit them and destroy confidence in them, have been demonstrated to be accurate in every case that could be confirmed or disproved by additional evidence. In every case thus far where it has been possible to establish the truth about persons whom any one of the three has said he knew as a member of the Communist apparatus, their testimony has been proved true. I think the country owes a debt of gratitude to them for their willingness, when subpenaed, to go back into their own past and bring out some thing which they naturally would rather have kept secret in order to do their duty to their country now and try to atone for the harm they did their country in the past.

What about the other persons—besides Hiss, Remington, Wadleigh, Pressman, and so forth—whom Bentley, Budenz, and Chambers have said they knew as members of the Communist Party, and whom loyalty boards or Senate committees have cleared? It seems to me that all of us who are sworn to defend our country against all enemies, foreign and domestic, must assume that such accused persons are suspect until proved otherwise and must govern ourselves accordingly. When deciding whom we are to believe, the record clearly indicates we can and should believe the three abovenamed witnesses who have consistently been proved right rather than the loyalty boards who have so often been wrong, to the detriment of our national interests.

FREEDOM FOR POLAND

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite appropriate that we should today recall the unconscionable agreements made at Yalta, from which emanated such unspeakable grief, injustice, turmoil, and current threats of war. Much of the strife and discord that exist in the world today can be traced to Yalta. Certainly the predominance, which the Soviets have achieved in world polity, is lastingly attributable to Yalta and similar concessions and appeasements.

One of the most shameful of all chapters in the Yalta handbook was the betrayal of Poland. Many times I have characterized that action as one of the great crimes of history and that is just what it is.

The idea of casually consigning into slavery the great and noble Polish people, with centuries of historic love for liberty and sacrifice from freedom, is monstrous. For my part, I have never acknowledged the validity of the agreements reached at Yalta, affecting the Polish and other free nations with similarly fine traditions, who were entitled to the same benefit of the principles enunciated in the Atlantic Charter, as other nations in the world.

I again make another emphatic and vigorous protest against the enslavement of the Polish people and ask this Government and this Congress to take a stand in favor of their deliverance from the tyranny of the Soviets. I ask that relief in the name, not only of Poland alone, but of Lithuania and other nations suffering under serfdom, and in the name of the millions who sacrificed so bitterly in order that freedom might be made a reality but whose sacrifices have been nullified up to this point by diplomatic blunders.

SUBVERSIVES

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when, in 1946 as chairman of the Republican National Committee, I made speeches on the platform and on the radio pointing out that Communists, fellow travelers, and subversives had insinuated themselves into positions of importance in the Government service and I named Alger Hiss and William Remington as examples, I was castigated, cartooned, and reviled extensively in the press. While no one takes satisfaction in seeing harm come to any individual, there is consolation that the records of some of these subversives are finally being established in the courts of our land. I am satisfied there are many others still in positions of influence.

UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, apropos of what some of the honorable gentlemen have said regarding the Remington conviction, particularly the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] regarding the attack made on people like Whittaker Chambers and Louis Budenz, I recall about 7 or 8 months ago when Louis Budenz appeared before a Senate committee and gave very strong testimony against one of the State Department policy advisers, Owen Lattimore. And, I recall that within a very few days thereafter a vicious attack was made against Louis Budenz on the Senate floor in an administration effort to protect Mr. Lattimore. It was a disgraceful thing. It was the type of thing that has brought us to the bad situation we are in today, not listening to the truth, trying to cover up some of the mistakes and some of the traitorous acts of people like Alger Hiss in the Government service and the pro-Communist advice of professors like Owen Lattimore called in to shape the thinking of Secretary Acheson in the disastrous far eastern policy that led to Korea.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, my real purpose in remaining here is to listen later on to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN]. But, while waiting for that, permit me to suggest to the members of the Committee on Appropriations, the Republicans, that you should not be too greatly grieved about the fact that they have stacked those subcommittees against you. In the last session the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments had 18 New Dealers—no, I guess it was 5 Democrats, 13 New Dealers, and but 7 Republicans. Being on that committee I considered that ratio something of a compliment. Seven Republicans equal to 5 Democrats plus 15 Truman Democrats, made me feel fairly good. So, my Republican colleagues on the Appropriations Committee do not grieve too much about it. Moreover, the Democrats were only trying to establish unity, and to do it by excluding the greatest possible number of Republicans from the committee and the subcommittees.

There is however a matter of principle involved in this situation and unless we are willing to ignore our duty to the Republican Party, abandon our faith in the two-party system we should take immediate aggressive action to right the wrong, to protect our colleagues on the Appropriations Committee.

In my judgment a resolution should be offered to the House instructing the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or the committee itself to appoint new subcommittees, the membership of which should be divided between Democrats and Republicans in as near as possible to the same ratio that exists in the House.

That has been the custom in the years gone by, it is fair and just. There is no reason why the chairman of that committee should be permitted to punish members who voted against his pet idea of the way appropriation bills should be handled.

If the Republican leadership does not offer such a bill I shall do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to talk about another subject.

Today, the Army, which has been in nominal charge of certain railroads since last August, issued an order which calls upon the striking employees to go back to work when called, unless they can show that they are really ill. If the strikers do not comply with this order, which was signed by Assistant Army Secretary Karl R. Bendetsen, they will be discharged—lose their jobs as railway employees.

The order states that, twice since last August, "a relatively small group of over one million employees have violated the law of the land."

I do not know whether this relatively small group of railway employees has violated the law of the land, but I do know that some of them have disobeyed court orders and that the effect of the transportation tie-up which they have brought about has prevented the shipment of needed munitions of war to the men who are fighting abroad; it has interfered with the movement of conscripted men to their training camps. It has prevented some men, who have served abroad, making visits to their families.

Twice, impartial mediation boards, appointed by the President under the law, have found that the demands of the railroad men were not justified, should not be granted.

On the last occasion, a mediation board, if my understanding is correct, recommended a raise of 18 cents an hour for the yardman, and 5 cents an hour for the roadmen. This recommendation was accepted by the railroads and by the officers of the union. Notwithstanding this agreement, some of the crews went on strikes and transportation was, for the second time, tied up.

The Army order anounces an interim wage increase of 12½ cents an hour for the yardmen, or 5½ cents less than was recommended by the Mediation Board; and 5 cents an hour, or the same increase that was recommended, for the roadmen.

One thing is certain—all too long, small groups in various unions which to a large extent are employed in activities supplying transportation, light, fuel and water to the public have been permitted to enforce their demands through strikes.

It has long been my contention that no group, either of workers or industrialists, should be permitted to follow a course which interfered with the health, welfare or safety of the public.

The soundness of this contention is apparent when we remember that the rates charged by public utilities, by companies furnishing the services above referred to, are often fixed by either State or Federal authorities.

It may be, as has sometimes been charged, that in the past these strikes have been brought about by Communists working from within the unions. We do know that the CIO, in recent months, has, as a matter of self-protection, been forced to expel a number of its affiliates because Communists had acquired control of those unions.

It would be absurd, it would be foolish, to charge that strikes as a whole are instigated or carried on by Communists, for there are few—but the few very powerful—Communists in unions.

There is strong reason to suspect that some, desiring the socialism of public utilities, have instigated, do lend support to, these strikes, in the hope that the Government will be forced to take over the companies operating these public utilities.

No doubt, some who wish the Government to take over are of the opinion that, when the Government secures control, then the unions, through political pressure and political alliance with those in authority, will find it easy to make good their demands for either shorter hours or increased compensation.

Few there are who believe that any man should be forced to work at a job other than one of his own choosing. It is equally true that no man should be permitted to be a dog in the manger, that is, to refuse to work at a job which did not suit him, where the compensation was not to his liking, and, in addition, prevent anyone else from working at that job. That sort of a position cannot be maintained in a free America.

A remedy? The remedy is simple if the facts are given consideration.

Unions have obtained a position of power because, and only because, the Congress has given unions and union members certain special privileges and benefits denied to nonunion members.

When the unions or the members of such unions refuse to exercise those powers wisely and judiciously, when they use those powers oppressively and, through the exercise of those powers, endanger the public health, safety or welfare, then the obvious remedy is not to throw the union men in jail, not to attempt to force them to work, but to deny them the special benefits and privileges which have been granted them by so-called labor legislation.

A bill has been introduced which would apply that remedy; which would take from union men the special benefits and privileges which they enjoy as union men, when they refuse to work at their jobs and when such refusal is injurious to the public as a whole.

There is evidence that the few who, in unions, attempt to use the special privileges granted them, capriciously, arbitrarily, injuriously, to the detriment of the public, have come to the end of the road; that the people, and the Congress, although lagging behind the people, will ultimately enact and insist upon the enforcement of legislation which will protect the public against the demands of the few.

THE REMINGTON CASE

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the conviction of William Remington, I think it only fair to point out, in view of the severe criticism of the House Committee on Un-American Activities that has been appearing recently in Westbrook Pegler's newspaper column, that whatever sins of omission or commission the committee has been guilty of, it was responsible, nevertheless, for the reopening of the Remington case. Through the efforts of the committee, additional evidence was certified. This evidence led to Remington's conviction yesterday in Federal court on a charge of perjury.

I had the honor to serve on the Committee on Un-American Activities during the Eighty-first Congress. I found, very quickly, that the work of that committee is extremely difficult. It is under constant attack, both from the right and from the left. The extreme right complains because it does not hang somebody before sunrise every morning. The extreme left denies that the committee has any business investigating anybody or anything.

It is my sincere belief, however, that the committee conducted its proceedings in the Eighty-first Congress with dignity, with fairness, and in keeping with its assigned mission. A careful reading of the published reports and transcripts of hearings bears this out, and my regret is that these publications have not received more general attention. It heard more witnesses, took more pages of testimony, and published more reports than at any time in the history of the committee.

The committee has uncovered a startling series of subversive Communist operations in the United States—operations undertaken methodically and accomplished with chilling success. The investigations of the committee gave clear proof of the extent to which the Communists have attempted a systematic undermining of our atomic research projects, establishment of sabotage cells in communications and in other key industries and infiltration of the Federal Government and such important defense bastions as the Territory of Hawaii.

The committee certainly is not immune to criticism. I believe Mr. Pegler should consider the whole record of the committee, however, in the interest of fair reporting.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute for the purpose of finding out the program to be announced by the majority leader for next week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, Monday is Lincoln's birthday and there will be no legislative business on that day. On Tuesday there will be no legislative business. There is no business scheduled for next week at all, as a matter of fact. The House has been acting so efficiently that we have disposed very promptly of the matters that have come before us.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I say that the gentleman from Massachusetts is being very courteous to the Republicans who will be speaking next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I appreciate the observation of my friend, and I want him to know that it brings pleasure to me to arrange the program with that in mind. It is what I want to do and what any decent-minded person in my position should do.

There will be no legislation on Wednesday. If there is any legislation to be considered next week it will not be before Thursday, and I know of none at the present time. If any legislation does come out of committee to come up next week, and that is to be considered under the regular rules of the House, that is, with general debate and consideration under the 5-minute rule, I shall give the House as much advance notice as possible so that Members will not be left in an unguarded position. However, I know of nothing important for next week, and insofar as I am able I shall try to have nothing important come up if it should be reported out of committee. I do not want to bind myself to that, but even if anything is reported out it will not come up before Thursday of next week.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I assume, then, that the majority leader has not in mind any anticipated emergencies that might call for action on a resolution or anything of that nature, and that those who stay here will have opportunity to express their views from the well of the House?

Mr. McCORMACK. As the gentleman knows, I am a great believer in the principle of freedom of speech. As far as I am concerned, I enjoy every speech I hear, whether or not I agree with it in whole or in part. If the gentleman has any desire to make speeches on any day next week, or every day, it is perfectly all right with me. We will meet every day except, of course, that I would not want to have the House meet on Friday of next week if we had no business.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not have any in mind now, but occasionally impulses to speak cause me to do so.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is quite a natural impulse, that we all thoroughly appreciate, and respect, I might say.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to this request or to a similar request next week, but, having a great desire to finish our work and get home sometime early next fall, after next week I intend to do what I can to see if we can expedite business so that when the 1st of September comes along the House may adjourn.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I say to the gentleman in all seriousness——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am serious about it.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know the gentleman is very serious about it, and not facetious. May I say that when the committees get rolling out legislation, if I set a week's program and the House disposes of it by Thursday, a good week's program, I am sure the gentleman from Michigan, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, would feel completely satisfied and glad to adjourn over from Thursday to Monday, even in the weeks after next week. Is that correct?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have seen so much in the papers about the T. T., but I am not a member of the T. T. Club.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is not much of a paper man, is he?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not know what you mean by that. I read the paper occasionally, the Washington Post, which advises me what I should do to serve the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan.

Mr. McCORMACK. But do you do it?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; no; I do not. I find in my experience that I can best serve my district if I just go the opposite, usually, to what they say. Of course, once in a while the Post does have a sound, constructive idea, but usually I can serve my people pretty well by going along the opposite way from what the Post suggests. The Post is just a little too internationalist for me. What I was thinking about was, not belonging to this—what do you call it?—T. to T. Club, that is, to come Tuesday and adjourn Thursday Club, I do not know any reason why some of us who come from so far away should be required to be here all the time and the others just go home for a large part of each week. I do not know what they do—maybe play golf or ride on their yachts when the sea permits; but anyway they just are not here. I am not finding fault with them nor with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. I know he works hard. He is always working. He tries—but are we to loaf along and then stay here until September or October or November?

Mr. McCORMACK. All of which comes under the principle of freedom of speech.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No; no freedom to get away and earn a dollar on another job when it might be well to give first attention to this job to which we are elected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of next week may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THANKS FOR THE COMPLIMENT

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, being one of the members of one of those subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations which have been packed 5 to 2, my reaction is just a little different from some of the other members. I am a little bit like old Uncle Mose, when the stranger at the gas station asked if he had the change of a $20 bill. Uncle Mose said, "No, sir; but thanks for the compliment."

If they have that much regard for the strength of my ranking member, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN], my reaction is, "Thanks for the compliment."

THE PRICE OF MILK

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, thus far through this session, in spite of all the talk and promises to do something about prices and rollbacks, we are still just where we started, with nothing as yet done.

The consumers of this country are paying too high a retail price for milk. The farmer is never guaranteed enough to cover his cost of producing this vital commodity.

People cannot continue paying 22 cents and up for a quart of milk. Even if they buy some at that figure, their children will not be privileged to get enough milk.

A family consisting of five children should be able to consume more than five and even seven quarts of milk per day. That means a regular charge on the family budget for milk alone of over $1.50 daily and well over $10 a week.

Those amounts will not include other dairy products such as butter, cream, or cheese which children need in addition to milk.

Therefore, 22 cents for a quart of milk makes this necessary food prohibitive for the American family table.

For several years, I have been pleading in vain for some action to remedy all these high food prices. Certainly milk is an outstanding example of how inflation has run wild with the average family food budget.

I am not among those, Mr. Speaker, who wants to blame this bad state of affairs on the dairy farmer. I own and operate a farm myself, not a large dairy, but a family size one. Therefore, I am able to testify that the average dairyman is in serious straits financially and that unless he is assured a fair and stable price for his milk, he is lost.

The dairymen in upstate New York cannot make his cost of production with an income of less than $5 per hundred pounds of milk. He cannot make a reasonable profit on an income of less than $6 for the same amount.

The farmer who receives an income of $5 per hundredweight actually realizes about 10 cents a quart for his milk. That looks big, but it is not, at least for the man who milks a herd of from 10 to 20 cows.

In order to give such a herd the proper care to obtain a decent yield, he must employ another man besides himself, especially if his son has been drafted. That requires an outlay of well over $100 a month to pay this hand and oftentimes $150.

This, added to the dairyman's taxes, his terrific feed bills, his supplies and machinery, makes it well-nigh impossible for him to stay in business.

Last spring, I was roundly criticized by selfish interests because I came out for a $6 minimum price per hundred pounds for the dairymen of the Northeast. Big city operators sent stooges to every creamery to smear me with the average farmer several months prior to my primary election.

A lot of money was spent to send thugs from farm to farm to try to force the farmers who had always supported me to vote for some other candidate.

Speakers were induced to go into the granges unbeknown to the rank and file members to do a job on me. They were vicious and loud in their denunciations of my record because I tried to get the dairy people of my section more money for their milk.

I do not expect to let these birds get started again because I am wise to what went on last time. I will have a few friends of my own planted in these meetings to stop these agitators in their tracks.

But let us return to the price the dairy farmer now receives for his product. It is unstable and inadequate. He lacks the guaranty he should have to produce enough of this vital food.

My bill proposes to give him a floor price of 10 cents a quart for milk, below which the market cannot go. Then he will be sure of some protection against a sheriff's sale of his property.

In the same bill, I provide for a ceiling price over the counter of 18 cents a quart.

This means the consumer gets fair treatment, the dairy farmer gets fair treatment. There is still a wide margin of profit between the 10 cents surety the farmer receives and the 18-cent quart of milk the consumer pays for

Unless something similar to these proposals is put into effect, the American public will soon be unable to buy any milk, the Armed Forces will be lacking sufficient diet, dairy producers all over the United States will have to give up.

Therefore, I urge this Congress to get busy, take the bull by the horns, and see that our price stabilizers put such a plan into immediate effect for the very survival of our Nation.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. DORN asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

SKILLED MANPOWER IS VITAL TO FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, policies of the Truman administration have set in motion a vicious inflationary price spiral that has increased the cost of living for every American. Persons living on fixed incomes, who do not profit from war expenditures, are hard hit as a result of the present inflationary trend. Food is the vital item for every consumer. I have taken this time to discuss food production in all of its phases.

According to the 1950 census about 18 percent of the population of the United States resides on the 6,000,000 farms of this country. More than two-thirds of these farms are known as the family-size farms that produce up to 85 percent of the average consumer diet. The family-size farms are generally operated by members of the farm family and on these are produced the dairy products, poultry, eggs, meat, fruits and vegetables so necessary for a healthy diet. It is not possible for the average farmer to employ competent labor, in competition with the short hours and high pay in industry, and therefore, the farmer and his family must do the work. Today, I am dealing in particular with the manpower problem confronting the farmers who operate family-size farms.

There is only one sound method to retard or stop the present inflationary spiral of food prices, and that is to secure more production of food by American farmers. Abundant production of food can only be assured for 1951 and the war years to come if Government manpower policies provide for the retention of essential farm workers on the farms and an adequate supply of farm machinery and equipment. Prompt action must be taken to initiate such policies or we will experience serious food shortages, black markets, higher food prices, and stricter Government control.

Because of the confusion and buck-passing that is found in top levels today over the need for skilled essential manpower in food production, I will discuss some of the common practices generally found throughout the Selective Service System in dealing with agricultural manpower problems.

It has been my observation, Mr. Speaker, that many consumers in this country and those who make the policies for the Government take it for granted that we will have ample food supplies to take care of the people without providing necessary manpower. Most of the consumers of the country do not realize that you must have skilled men to produce food in this country if it is to be produced and in abundance.

It also appears that the Defense Establishment does not appreciate the vital part that food production and supplies play in a wartime economy. This is evidenced by the following correspondence that I have recently had with the Secretary of Defense:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 18, 1950.

Gen. GEORGE MARSHALL,
Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Since I represent a district in the Midwest where a large portion of the Nation's food is produced, I am writing you to get your opinion on the need for abundant food production in connection with the present war effort.

During the last two wars the following slogan was publicized: "It will take food to win the war and write the peace." If this slogan deals with realities in connection with winning the war, I would very much like to have an expression from you which I can publicize to encourage additional production of vital food for the men in the Armed Forces, our allies, and for the domestic economy.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

AUGUST H. ANDRESEN,
Member of Congress.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, December 26, 1950.

The Honorable AUGUST H. ANDRESEN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. ANDRESEN: In answer to your letter of December 18 asking for my opinion on the need for abundant food production in connection with the present war effort, I can state that the ability of a country to supply its armed forces with adequate food is one of the most important considerations in the conduct of war.

I believe, however, that any specific recommendations with reference to the production of food should properly come from the Department of Agriculture. I would, therefore, suggest that you address your inquiry with reference to your district to Secretary Brannan.

Faithfully yours,

ROBERT LOVETT,
Acting Secretary.

It will be noted that Acting Secretary Lovett does not concern himself with food production for the civilian economy or the inflationary price spiral when food shortages occur. He simply refers me to Secretary of Agriculture Brannan for information on food production. Secretary Brannan is urging all-out food and cotton production, but has done nothing to secure the retention of essential and skilled manpower on the food producing farms of this country. I want to be fair with the Secretary of Agriculture, because his Department is working with the Departments of State and Labor to have 500,000 Mexicans brought to this country to do seasonal work on cotton, sugar beet, vegetable, and fruit farms. But this type of labor can under no circumstances replace the skilled domestic workers vital to food production on dairy, livestock, poultry, and grain producing farms of this country.

It is estimated that more than 750,000 skilled farm workers will leave the farms in 1951. Of this number 500,000 will be drafted into the Army and 250,000 will go into more highly paid defense work. This exodus of skilled manpower away from our food-producing farms, with no replacement available, is bound to curtail food production and add more fire to the inflationary spiral of food prices.

THERE SHOULD BE NO GENERAL DEFERMENT FOR ANY TYPE OF LABOR

Food is the vital item for every civilian and soldier. Without food the people cannot live, work, or fight. The high price of food is the main complaint from consumers. To produce necessary food, we must have adequate manpower, machinery, and equipment.

I do not recommend that all farm workers be deferred from the draft, but I do insist that the Selective Service System adopt a uniform Nation-wide manpower policy that will properly classify essential, and I emphasize, essential farm workers, so that such essential workers may continue in food production. Such a policy should be mandatory and a requirement for every local draft board is considering the merits of each request for deferment. At least one able-bodied man should be allowed to remain on each farm.

I am not criticizing local draft boards. These boards are made up of patriotic Americans who are giving much of their time, without compensation, in the present war emergency. They are assigned a quota on every call for men and they do their best to fill it. They work under terrific local pressure and are subject to much abuse. However, this pressure and abuse would not occur if local boards would evaluate each draft case under specific instructions from General Hershey, the Director of Selective Service.

The Selective Service System should be Nation-wide in its scope, operating under specific regulations applicable to all parts of the country. The following letter from General Hershey would indicate that the governor of each State heads the Selective Service System for his State. If such be the case, does the governor have the power to issue specific regulations for the guidance of local draft boards?

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1951.

The Honorable AUGUST H. ANDRESEN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. ANDRESEN: As requested by you, I am confirming the information which Colonel Franck, of my staff, furnished you when he was recently in your office concerning the status of a State director of selective service for a State.

The Selective Service Act of 1948, as amended, provides in section 10 (b) (2) authority for the President "to appoint, upon recommendation of the respective governor or comparable executive official, a State Director of the Selective Service System for each headquarters in each State, Territory, and possession of the United States and for the District of Columbia, who shall represent the governor and be in immediate charge of the State headquarters of the Selective Service System: * * *".

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS B. HERSHEY, Director.

General Hershey indicates that he has no control over the State selective service system. He states that the State selective service organization is appointed upon the recommendation of the Governor. In view of this fact, it seems to me that one way to handle the agricultural manpower problem would be for the Governor of each respective State to formulate mandatory regulations to govern local draft boards in the consideration of agricultural and other essential manpower problems.

In my own State of Minnesota at least 50 percent of the food which is produced is used throughout the entire Nation and much of it finds its way into the Military Establishment. Therefore, a loss of a substantial number of essential farm workers now engaged in food production in our State, will be a loss to the Nation. The end result will be drastic cut-backs in production to the detriment of the Nation and our war effort. I feel that the Governors of our respective States should exercise their authority with reference to the manpower problem.

It is obvious that we must have men for the military forces. It should be equally obvious that we must also have skilled men to produce the food for the country and men to produce war materials. The President possesses sufficient authority under the Selective Service Act of 1948 to issue specific regulations to deal with essential agricultural manpower. He has not used this authority, which is found in paragraphs 622.13 and 622.14 of the draft law and quoted as follows:

622.13. Class II–C.—Registrant deferred because of agricultural occupation: (a) In class II–C shall be placed any registrant who is employed in the production for market of a substantial quantity of those agricultural commodities which are necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest, but only when all of the conditions described in section 622.10 are found to exist.

(b) The production for market of a substantial quantity of agricultural commodities should be measured in terms of the average annual production per farm worker which is marketed from a local average farm of the type under consideration. The production of agricultural commodities for consumption by the worker and his family, or traded for subsistence purposes, should not be considered as production for market. Production which is in excess of that required for the subsistence of the farm families on the farm under consideration should be considered as production for market.

622.14. Length of deferments in class II–C: (a) Class II–C deferments shall be for a period of 1 year or less. If there is a change in the registrant's status during the period of deferment in class II–C, his classification shall be reopened and considered anew.

(b) At the expiration of the period of a registrant's deferment in class II–C, his classification shall be reopened and he shall be classified anew in the manner provided in part 625 of this chapter. The registrant may be continued in class II–C for a further period of 1 year or less if such classification is warranted. The same rule shall apply when classifying a registrant at the end of each successive period for which he has been classified in class II–C.

(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to require the local board to retain in class II–C any registrant when the reason for his occupational classification has ceased to exist.

During the past 3 months I have had many conferences with policy-making members of the National Selective Service Office on the subject of proper classification of essential farm workers. I regret to state that up to the present time there has been no change in the policy of that office with reference to the proper classification of essential farm workers.

GENERAL HERSHEY STATES LOCAL BOARDS HAVE FULL RESPONSIBILITY TO PROPERLY CLASSIFY ESSENTIAL WORKERS

In a recent letter to local draft boards discussing the responsibility of local boards in properly classifying registrants in essential occupations, Gen. Lewis B. Hershey has set forth the following facts:

First. The local draft board has the responsibility for determining, initially, every classification of a registrant.

Second. A registrant seeking a deferred classification for occupational hardship or other reasons should furnish the local board with a complete written statement, supplemented by substantiating evidence, giving all facts for the local boards to consider in properly classifying the registrant.

Third. A registrant has the right to appeal his classification to the State appeal board if he is dissatisfied with the decision of the local board. The attorney for the local board will assist the registrant in perfecting the appeal.

If the decision of the State appeal board is not unanimous, a further appeal may be taken to the President's appeal board in Washington.

Fourth. Under Selective Service Regulation 1625, a registrant may have his classification reconsidered by the local board upon the presentation of new evidence at any time before the induction notice is issued to the registrant by the board. Such request for reconsideration should be made in writing to the local board.

If the local board does not change the classification of the registrant after considering the new evidence, the registrant is entitled to again appeal his classification to the State appeal board.

Fifth. A registrant is entitled to a hearing before the entire local board, as a matter of right.

General Hershey also states in the letter to the local draft boards:

It has been unfortunate that this strict application has found utterance attributed to local board members by registrants that local boards could defer no one in the absence of specific instructions to do so or that they would defer no one of certain occupational classifications, such as farmers or members of the maritime service. In the first instance, the power to defer does rest with the local board. In the second instance, it is unwise for an administrative agency responsible for individual decisions, such as the classification of a registrant, to indicate that decisions are made to defer or not to defer in any other manner than after a careful consideration of the particular merits of the individual case.

The danger inherent in this situation is that the pressure for legislation or for regulations, or for both, increase. There is a demand that local boards be authorized to do that which they already can do, but with the authorization will inevitably come directives as to what they can and what they must do. The autonomy of local self-government disappears more often by abdication from within than usurpation from above.

The selective service operation is a decentralized one. All of the actions which lead to the induction of men into the Armed Forces are performed in the community. This fact requires that the power to act be delegated to the local board. This has been done in large measure by the Congress by giving to the local board the responsibility for determining, initially, every classification of a registrant. This classification is final unless there is an appeal exercised under regulations provided by the President.

The question to be decided is whether the task being performed by the registrant is essential to the national interest; and finally, can he be replaced. These are judgments that in the last analysis local board members have rendered in the past and must render in the future. The making of these judgments is their responsibility. It is the local board's job.

Since many of the local boards have taken the position that they do not have the authority to properly classify essential farm workers, General Hershey's instructions definitely give the local boards full authority and responsibility to pass upon the qualifications and occupation of each registrant. This may be buck passing but, nevertheless, it is now definite that the local boards have full responsibility to pass upon the essentiality of each registrant in food production or any other line of occupation. Each case must be decided upon its merits by the local board.

A few days ago Mrs. Anna Rosenberg, Assistant Defense Secretary for Manpower, appeared before a committee and stated it was necessary to have 4,000,000 workers in industry, engaged in the manufacture of implements of war. But she said nothing about the need for manpower in food production.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am very glad to have the gentleman from Minnesota, who is a congressional authority on agriculture, bring this thing up, because it looks to me as if this is where we come in, as they say in the motion-picture industry; as if we are going through the same things which we went through during World War II. The gentleman will remember that we did not have any allocations of steel or essential materials especially for agriculture, and if it was necessary to get repairs or baling wire, or whatever it might be, he would have to get permission to purchase it, and it was a sort of hunting license, to see if he could go out and see if he could find it.

I am particularly glad to have him bring up the matter of labor because there has been a movement—I have seen it in a labor journal laid on my desk in the last few days; I have seen it in a magazine which I have read called

The New Leader, a complete misrepresentation, a complete misstatement of the facts; and I am very glad the gentleman is bringing up the question so we may have a thorough airing of it and a determination of whether or not we shall be able to retain the labor on our farms that we need, that is, retain the essential trained labor, and whether we shall be able to get the vegetables and the foodstuffs out of the fields.

The gentleman will remember that in World War II, even though we had an amendment known by the name of a former Member of the other body, the Tydings amendment, which had for its purpose the protecting of skilled labor, the protecting of experienced labor on the farms for producing the foodstuffs that were needed, yet Selective Service paid no attention to it. The gentleman will remember that.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I remember that very well, and I may say that in the Draft Act that was passed last year the President of the United States was given the same authority virtually that was contained in the Tydings amendment; he now possesses the power to issue regulations to permit local draft boards to defer essential farm workers that they may continue in the production of food.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does not the gentleman feel that the Congress should pass some sort of legislation prescribing that Selective Service must leave at least one able-bodied man on each family-sized farm during the emergency? In my district I have cases today where the only able-bodied man working on a particular farm, the man who has been actually operating that farm has been given instructions that he has got to have a sale and get ready to go into the service—an established farm family that has been in existence for several years. I do not think that is good business for the Nation as a whole.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There are thousands of similar cases throughout the United States, because it is quite apparent it is now the policy of Selective Service down to the local draft boards to draft men who are essential to produce the food the Nation needs.

I do not urge that farm workers be deferred as a class; I think that the case of every selectee who comes up and presents his facts should be determined on the merits, whether or not he is essential. It would be a big mistake were we to ask for the deferment of all farm boys as a class, and I do not want to do that; I would be against that. But out home, out in the areas where we really produce the bulk of the Nation's food and in parts of the country where they have small production the local boards are so close to the production that they sometimes do not comprehend the important part that people in the producing areas play toward furnishing the over-all supply of food for the Nation. So, I hope that when we have our hearings before the Committee on Agriculture we can prevail upon General Hershey and upon the President—he will not be there, but through General Hershey—so that we can have a definite policy whereby each case may be determined upon its own merits by the local boards instead of just drafting them into the service wholesale.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I was very much interested in the description of the type of farm mentioned by Mr. ANDERSEN, where the only able-bodied man of a farm family was about to be taken; for instance, it may be a farm where the father is an elderly man and has an only son who really operates the farm, yet he is being considered for the draft. I think that practically destroys that farm unit and it is an important unit yet in this country. To what extent can the gentleman state whether or not this foreign labor we are bringing into the country will help that kind of farm?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, that I have scores of cases in my congressional district where the only son has been classified in I–A for induction into the Army. That is one reason I am calling this vital matter to the attention of the House and the country, with the hope that corrective measures will be promptly taken by General Hershey. The foreign labor to which I referred cannot do the work on our dairy, poultry, livestock, and grain farms. They are not suited for this type of farming, and they can in no manner replace the young men from our farms, who have been trained through life to do the work.

While I have many draft cases in my district, I know that a similar situation prevails throughout the entire country—particularly in food-producing areas. Food production and the essential manpower to produce it, must be dealt with on a Nation-wide scale if farmers are to produce food in abundance as demanded by the Secretary of Agriculture. To close down or curtail farming operation because of a shortage of essential farm workers in the present inflationary war emergency, does not make sense, even in the United States and the President and his administrative officials should do something about it. We can pass more legislation on the subject, but that will not afford relief unless the executive branch of the Government administers the law in accordance to the intent of Congress. I say again, that the President possesses ample authority under existing law to issue regulations that will correct the mistake now being made in agricultural manpower policies.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman means foreign labor from any area from which we obtain it could not be utilized?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No. It is not there. The labor that can be used in vegetable, sugar beet areas, and the cotton areas, a good deal of it at least, is stoop labor. The Mexicans and other foreign labor that come in here can do that kind of work. But we who represent diversified areas, producing at least 85 percent of the perishable crops of the country, must have skilled, competent labor to produce it. The farmers who operate these family sized farms are not able to go into the labor market and employ experienced farm labor to replace their own boys who are taken into the Army because they cannot compete with the short hours and high wages of the industrial centers of the country.

Mr. BECKWORTH. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture, is the gentleman in position to state whether or not a small, family sized cotton farm, we will say, would likely qualify for that labor that is brought in?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, I know what kind of labor you need. You need a certain amount of skilled labor, of course, and you can probably get along, at least for a time, with some of the imported labor, much more so than we can up in our section of the country.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Foreign labor should be divided into two classes, the class which is brought in specifically to pick a crop in a large area, to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers, and those that come in little by little under the immigration laws and have stayed here and acquired the facility to operate. Those can be used on the small farms. The imported labor can be used on cotton ranches.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Is the machinery to be so worked out that we will say the average small farmer in a given area can participate in the program?

Mr. PHILLIPS. This morning I read a release of the Department of State and I am very doubtful that we will be able to participate in the program satisfactorily unless some material changes are made in it. That is why the gentleman's committee is doing a great service in holding public hearings on this matter. I know what the gentleman has in mind and it is a very important point.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I do not want to go into that picture at this time because we have had extensive hearings on it. I know what the gentleman from Texas is referring to. However, our committee will hold a hearing on February 26, according to what the chairman of that committee told me this morning, so that we can go into the whole manpower situation. What I want to direct attention to at this time is the policy of the drafting of essential farm labor from the family-sized farms where experienced men are required to produce food.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I want to compliment the gentleman from Minnesota on his analysis of this problem and to refer to what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN] said with respect to leaving one able-bodied man on each family-sized farm. Actually that system was tried during World War II in Iowa through a directive, I believe from State headquarters of the Iowa Selective Service System. I served as chairman of one Selective Service Board during the early part of that war. I know the problem to which the gentleman has alluded was very acute at that time. My observation has been that the plan of leaving one able-bodied man at least on every family-sized farm under this directive to which I have referred worked quite well, and, as a rule of thumb, I am not so sure but what it might not be applicable to every part of the United States and might well be written into law.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CLEVENGER. As the gentleman knows, my district is largely agricultural, with the exception of perhaps two or three industrial centers. We have this problem facing us right now. But, is not this labor that the gentleman proposes to bring in coming from a United Nations neighbor?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, I think that is correct.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Can the gentleman see any good reason why we should furnish an asylum for another nation to send their sons to America while we send ours to fight and die in a war over on the other side of the Pacific?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, that is one reason for this discussion.

Mr. CLEVENGER. We have to have the right kind of labor to get the job done.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. We have to get it done if we are to provide food. As far as our committee is concerned and I am personally concerned, I am only interested in getting food produced in abundance for the American people in order to stop inflation, in order to stop black markets, in order to have less Government control. You know, one of the principal demands for price control is on account of high food prices at the consumer level. Let us try to solve the proposition by securing abundant production. But to do so we must have the manpower and the machinery and the farm equipment to do it.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SADLAK. Does the gentleman contend that there is necessity for some action that will tell the immediate draft boards not to take farmers?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Yes; immediate action is vital and urgent for essential farm workers.

Mr. SADLAK. May I clear up that point?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. SADLAK. It is my understanding that from areas which include agricultural districts the members of those immediate draft boards are constituted, or have membership on them, of farmers who know the problem.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is not entirely correct.

Mr. SADLAK. If I understand what the gentleman desires to bring about, it is that they have no alternative other than to take a person, whether he be a farmer or not, in answer to the demands of the quota needed, but that action is necessary on top of that to restrain the taking of a farmer from that area, even though there was a call for men from that area who are farmers.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Let me make it clear, because I do not want to be misunderstood. In the first place, I do not favor a general exemption for farm workers; but I insist that if it comes down to the production of food we must have experienced and essential manpower to produce it. Now, the only way we can get the manpower on most of the farms in our country is from the farmer's own family, and in each case where a boy or young man is being called for induction his case should be considered by the local draft board as to whether or not he is essential to the production of food. Now, to give that consideration they must, of course, have the facts before the board. Heretofore in many sections of the country facts have been ignored. But what I think we should have emanating from Washington is a definite policy that every board should consider a man's essentiality in the line that he is in, especially if it is in food production, so that the board can determine whether he is essential or he is not essential, without just automatically putting him into the service without considering the merits of each case.

Mr. SADLAK. If the gentleman will yield further, over the past week I had a like case in Connecticut, and I am sure the gentleman from Minnesota will concede that among the many industries we have in the great State of Connecticut we also have a great deal of farming. We had the case of two boys of farm families. One had been on the farm throughout his 23 years; the other, a lad of 25, brought up on the farm, but who left the farm and had gone out into another industry, another business. As of the first week of January they have taken the lad who had been on the farm all of his life. Now they are preparing to take the other lad, who had left the farm. The father says that he is ill and should have one of the boys back on the farm, the one who had left the farm. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Of course, I am not a draft board and cannot pass on that question, but if the gentleman has had one case like that, I know of hundreds of them that are somewhat similar, where the boys have left the farm and gone into business or are farming for themselves. In fact, I have one case that I got yesterday where there are three boys in the family. They have a 340-acre farm. Two boys have already enlisted in the Air Corps and the third is now in class I–A, ready for induction next week. This leaves a father, who is 63 years old, to operate that 340-acre farm, with a lot of livestock. He just cannot do it. He is 63.

Down here in Washington they retire admirals and generals at 62 because they say they are no longer any good, yet expect men who are that age or older, with disabilities, heart trouble, arthritis, rheumatism, and a good many other things to go ahead and operate large farms.

Mr. SADLAK. I desire, of course, to cooperate with the gentleman wholeheartedly in this tremendous and vital problem, but they have told me, as no doubt they have told the gentleman, that on the draft board as constituted covering that area, agriculture has a member.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. As a rule there is no farm member on a local board.

Mr. SADLAK. They have told me that. If the gentleman has found that they have not, then I am ready to cooperate with him in order that they may have a properly constituted, fully informed draft board, so they would know all the problems, particularly those concerning agriculture.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. According to the present set-up, the draft boards are appointed by the governor through the State selective-service director, who is appointed by the governor. What I am trying to get at is that we should have a coordinated policy in the country, from the President down through the Selective Service, that will issue specific instruction to the local draft boards and the State selective-service director that each case in agriculture or some other line shall be considered on its merits as to the essentiality of the man who is being drafted.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. First I want to compliment the gentleman on the statement he is making. It is the first attempt to probe into this subject that I have heard on the floor in recent weeks. May I say that I am of the same opinion as the gentleman, that I think there should be some kind of policy stated, and stated soon, otherwise farm labor is going to be drafted off every dairy farm in up-State New York and in Minnesota and other dairy States.

I do not know whether I want to go any further than the gentleman does in saying that we should defer or give special attention to the deferment of farmers, but I do know that the dairy farmer has a particular problem. He has a specialized work which the migrant labor cannot attend to. Such a worker cannot help on a dairy farm. It would take at least a year to get accustomed to running a dairy. Therefore, at least in my section, every single farm off which these boys are being drafted is going to be forced to close up its dairy. The farmer will just have to sell off his stock and go out of business. The flow of milk will become considerably lighter if that keeps on. That is not in the interest of producing food for our Armed Forces.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman. That is the point I have tried to make, that food production is vital to the economy of the country and to the war effort in which we are engaged in the present emergency.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I was not here when the gentleman began his speech, so I do not know whether he has covered this point or not, but I understand however you are arguing we must have some migrant labor at least?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No, I am not talking about migrant labor, I am talking about the family labor on a family sized farm, such as you have in your area and we have all through the Middle West where we cannot employ good outside labor to come in and do the work on the farm because of the competition with the cities with the short hours and the high wages that is offered, which the farmer cannot pay. I am talking about that kind of labor which is necessary to produce the food and if essential farm workers are taken into the service we will not be able to produce the food for the country.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Some of the work on our farms is not done by local people, that is, what you call the stoop labor and some of the fruit picking, but this other situation which I think you have in mind, from what I heard, existed in the last war. The gentleman recalls, I know, that then we had the Tydings amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is right. That has been discussed.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then we had the proposed Lemke amendment. I am sure you recall that the gentlemen from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] put the facts in the RECORD here one time as did some others from Michigan, but General Hershey, notwithstanding the Tydings amendment, insisted that the local boards, acting through the State board, were instructed to draft the farm labor which was in violation of the Tydings amendment. Have you any remedy which will prevent that situation from happening again?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. What I am trying to do it to get a coordinated policy, starting from the President down, who has the authority under the Selective Service Act, which was passed in 1948, to issue orders so that local boards and the Selective Service organization will consider each case for each industry on its own merits and write regulations that the local boards should follow in considering a man's occupation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. They did that before and then along came General Hershey who said, "No, never mind all that stuff. You take the men." In fact he came to my office with some more brass and he said, "It does not make any difference what the Tydings amendment says, we need the men and we are going to take them." That is the situation that worries me.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. What I am worried about is that we will not have the essential manpower to produce the food and farm prices will pierce the ceilings and then we will have strict Government control—rationing and black markets in vital items, like beef, veal, pork, poultry, and eggs—throughout the country on a Nation-wide scale and people who want to live according to the law of the land and regulations, will not be able to get meat through legitimate channels.

From a political angle that might be a good thing, but here we are dealing with realities and that is the production of food for the people. Those of us who are working to bring about a situation where the consumer will have plenty of food at reasonable prices should be given assistance by the administration to solve this critical manpower problem before it is too late.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOLLINGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. DELANEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address by the Honorable JOHN SPARKMAN, of Alabama, on the occasion of the annual Democratic dinner in New York.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a statement by Dr. Hugh Bennett.

Mr. O'NEILL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article.

Mr. HAMILTON C. JONES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a radio broadcast over Station WBT, Charlotte, N. C., also questions and answers in which the public is interested.

Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. DOYLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. SUTTON (at the request of Mr. HAYS of Ohio) was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. FERNANDEZ (at the request of Mr. MURDOCK) was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a report of the Wayne County Soil Conservation District.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and include extraneous matter; and further to extend his remarks and include the bylaws of the Italian-American World War Veterans, notwithstanding the fact that it will exceed two pages of the RECORD and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $492.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in five instances and include newspaper articles and letters.

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, February 12, 1951, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

185. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to require the recordation of scrip, lieu selection, and similar rights"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

186. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a law enacted by the Tenth Guam Congress, Public Law 36; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. STANLEY: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 37. Resolution authorizing additional clerical assistants; with amendment (Rept. No. 96). Ordered to be printed.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 29, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, Father of our spirits, whose power is unsearchable and whose judgments are a great deep, at the beginning of the day we would quiet our hearts in Thy presence. We would be still and know that Thou art God. As amid the earthquake, wind, and fire of this violent world we wait for Thy still small voice, give us sensitive hearts to listen, teachable minds to learn, humble wills to obey. Let some revelation of Thy light fall on our darkness, some guidance from Thy wisdom save us from our bewilderment, some power from Thine infinite resource strengthen us in our need.

We acknowledge our oneness with all humanity. Humbling ourselves in penitence for our boasted pride, confessing our share in the evil that has brought confusion and ruin on the earth and praying for an ordered society of nations that shall give substance and hope to man's dream of brotherhood, we ask in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 8, 1951, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

(At the request of Mr. HENDRICKSON, and by unanimous consent, the following remarks by Mr. HENDRICKSON and editorials submitted by him in connection therewith were ordered to be printed at this point in today's RECORD:)

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are met here today on the anniversary of the birth of the sixteenth President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln. There may be some who will disagree when I say that Abraham Lincoln was the greatest of all our Presidents, but I make that statement, believing firmly that it is so. Some historians, some students, and some political writers may disagree, but I say that it is so because Mr. Lincoln lived in the most crucial hour of the Nation's history, an hour even as crucial as that in which we are living today, and he led us to safety and security once more. As we of the Senate, when we pay tribute to the first President of the United States, George Washington, on his birthday, recognize that none of us possess sufficient eloquence to pay just and fitting tribute to him, and therefore substitute for our lack of eloquence the reading of his own eloquent Farewell Address, therefore, Mr. President, in recognizing the greatness of Abraham Lincoln, I think we must also recognize that in his case, as in the case of Washington, we who serve in this body lack the eloquence to pay to the martyred President the full tribute which is properly due him. Perhaps the greatest epitaph ever written of Mr. Lincoln was written by his great Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, when at the time of Mr. Lincoln's death, Mr. Stanton said—despite the many bitter differences of opinion which existed between Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Stanton—"Now he belongs to the ages."

Mr. President, as we pay Washington a tribute by reading the words of his Farewell Address, so now I endeavor to pay appropriate tribute to Mr. Lincoln by reading a few words from his second inaugural address, delivered on March 4, 1865, which are as appropriate today as they were when they were uttered at the end of the War Between the States. In that address Abraham Lincoln said:

> Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said "the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

And then he said, as we remember his famous words:

> With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Mr. President, I think those words in themselves pay Mr. Lincoln all the tribute which any mortal could hope to pay to him. They are his own immortal words—almost as eloquent, indeed, as the words of his Gettysburg address.

Mr. President, some of the great newspapers today have paid tribute to Mr. Lincoln more eloquently than I could ever hope to do. Therefore I shall ask unanimous consent to speak through them and to have printed at this point in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, three stirring, thought-provoking editorials in honor of Lincoln. They should be read by every Member of the Senate. One is from the Philadelphia Inquirer, and is entitled "Lincoln's Way Can Still Save America and Freedom."

Another, entitled "The 'Lincoln Idea'," is published in the New York Times for today. I hope every Member of the Senate will take the time to read this editorial in the light of the situation existing in the world today.

The third editorial, entitled "The Universal Lincoln," appears in today's issue of the New York Herald Tribune. It constitutes another thought-provoking discussion of a great man.

Mr. President, I cannot say any more that would raise the name of Lincoln higher than he himself raised it throughout his entire life, and up to the time of his death. We should be grateful that our people show an ever-growing recognition of his greatness, and are reflecting that recognition in their everyday lives.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that these remarks and these editorials may appear in the RECORD at the beginning of the proceedings for today, rather than at the end of them, as a further tribute to Mr. Lincoln.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer of February 12, 1951]

LINCOLN'S WAY CAN STILL SAVE AMERICA AND FREEDOM

On this birthday of Abraham Lincoln the great question is whether this is the glorious Nation he fought so hard and so well to save.

Are its people as determined in 1951, as they were in 1861, to preserve its freedom? Are they as eager to struggle against terrible odds to continue America on the path to still greater destinies?

We believe that to all such questions an affirmative answer can instantly be given and that Lincoln himself, who once fervently spoke of the promise of "man's vast future" in our country, would without hesitation render the same verdict.

The Rail Splitter, as he was about to become President, saw the enormous perils that were rushing upon the Nation and remarked: "The man does not live who is more devoted to peace than I am, none who would d more to preserve it, but it may be necessary to put the foot down firmly."

Look at his subsequent course: he sought peace, but with never a thought of appeasement. Up till the first shot at Sumter and throughout the war which followed he repelled every attempt to bring about its end on terms that would weaken the Union.

Lincoln, who knew how to deal with Copperheads and traitors, faintheart's and appeasers, has virtually given us a chart for national conduct in dealing with the Reds and fellow travelers of 1951 and the dangers they represent now.

There were timorous Americans in 1861 who wanted to "let the erring sisters go." They wanted to give up the Union—they wanted peace at any price. Throughout the war there were disloyal people who secretly or openly tried to aid the enemy.

Abraham Lincoln's steadfast wisdom overcame them all. With similar but greater perils from the Red menace confronting us today we need to cling to the Great Emancipator's way as the only way to discharge our duty of world leadership; to save America and with it human liberty on this earth.

[From the New York Times of February 12, 1951]

THE "LINCOLN IDEA"

It might even be true, as some scoffers say, that Lincoln has become "the great American myth." It could be true that the cult of "Lincolnolatry" has obscured the man and most of the facts about him. Nevertheless, the man and his meaning have an indisputable and an unshakable place in American life and in the hearts and minds of almost all Americans. There is definitely such a thing as the "Lincoln idea." The name is a symbol, and its connotation is much the same wherever it is spoken.

To invoke the name of Lincoln is to place first emphasis on complete integrity. This feeling has now gone far beyond the "Honest Abe" of his contemporaries. The man symbolizes for us the positive conception of personal goodness and social righteousness. The image of Lincoln is recalled when we, as persons or as members of a social group, are asked to choose between right and wrong, good and evil. That image strengthens our resolution. It may, indeed, dictate our choice.

To most Americans, also, the name Lincoln connotes the true dignity of a great simplicity. It is the foe of artifice, the destroyer of vanity. If Americans are, as they should be, humble in his presence, it is in the realization that he, too, was humble in the presence of the great tasks with which he was confronted.

That sense of integrity and simplicity is carried over into the application of the "Lincoln idea" to matters of Government and the affairs of the state. It is partly because Lincoln himself was so much of the people that he could speak persuasively of government by and for them. He gave us our most eloquent and, at the same time, our simplest real definition of government by the consent of the governed. He made us feel that we were our masters so long as we kept faith with the ideals that had been set up for us.

Surely, this Lincoln's birthday is a time when we can once more call upon his image and what it represents for the strength and encouragement that we need. We are still engaged in a great struggle to see if our society, founded on the concepts of freedom, can survive and endure. From Abraham Lincoln we can once more hear a call for a new dedication to that struggle and once more determine that we shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of February 12, 1951]

THE UNIVERSAL LINCOLN

One can imagine that Abraham Lincoln would chuckle a little wryly if he were to witness all the causes that in later days were to seek the support of his name and the shelter of his tradition. It is the fate of every national hero to have his words and deeds cited by future generations in new contexts, but few have been so variously honored in this way as Lincoln. Doubtless he would have some earthy frontier narrative to fit the case, as he did for the episodes of his years of trial. Yet it is part of the quality of the man, his universality, that so many should turn to him, so long after his death, for wisdom and inspiration. Perhaps they misread the message of his life, perhaps some distort it. Nevertheless, that grand figure, looming through the mists of time, seems to absorb the misconceptions and the distortions of praise as he once withstood those of blame, and is not lessened thereby.

Even in his stormy lifetime, when the unperceptive looked upon him as a strange and comic creature from a rude environment, facing responsibilities beyond his grasp, the magic of Lincoln's personality was at work. Those who cheered the pompous oration of Edward Everett at Gettysburg and jeered at the concise power of the President's address were nevertheless uneasily conscious that the latter was the product of no mean mind. Those who were shocked at tales of Lincoln's crudity or fastidiously repelled by his tall, gaunt form, heard him, at his second inauguration, speak words of enduring majesty. And when his assassination tore away the veils of hatred, misunderstanding, and partisanship that had shrouded him, the upsurge of respect and affection swept over the bounds of section, faction, and Nation. There was no more felicitous epitaph than that of Stanton, as Lincoln died: "Now he belongs to the ages." If, sometimes, posterity tends to squander this rich legacy unworthily, it does not matter. Lincoln's heart, as Emerson said, was as great as the world; there is enough for mankind to share.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I think we all appreciate the splendid tribute paid by my distinguished colleague from New Jersey to the great American, Abraham Lincoln. I know that we should all be happy to be identified with that fine expression, both of patriotism and of important national history, especially in times like the present, when the spirit of Lincoln, above all things, is so needed in our own national life and in the life of the world.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE ON FINANCE TO REPORT BILLS DURING THE RECESS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate Committee on Finance may have the privilege of filing reports during the recess of the Senate between today and Thursday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to present petitions and memorials, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and submit other routine matters for the RECORD, without debate and without speeches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FEDERAL REGISTER—UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to article 36, section 1, Public law 506, Eighty-first Congress, I am transmitting herewith a copy of part II of the Federal Register, February 10, 1951, in which there are set forth the rules and regulations which I have promulgated to implement the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 12, 1951.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO MILITARY ACADEMY

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to law, the Chair announces the appointment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to law, the Chair appoints the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

The petition of Mrs. Harry Lee Brittingham, of East Orange, N. J., relating to the budget and defense spending; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A resolution adopted by the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia, favoring the creation of a transportation commission for the metropolitan area of Washington, D. C., etc., to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The petition of Domingo S. Romau, of San Juan, P. R., relating to relief for World War I veterans; to the Committee on Finance.

The petition of Mrs. Constance Darling, of Dolgeville, N. Y., relating to the withdrawal of all United Nations armed forces from Korea; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A resolution adopted by the Twenty-ninth Division Association, Inc., Washington, D. C., relating to the donation of certain funds in the form of currency by the public to assist quadruple amputees; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by the Twenty-ninth Division Association, Inc., Washington, D. C., protesting against the shipment of all materials having any value to Communist China; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. THYE:

A concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Concurrent resolution memoralizing the President and Congress of the United States to promptly take all measures necessary to complete the St. Lawrence waterway

"Whereas representatives of the Governments of the United States and the Dominion of Canada in 1941 consummated and signed an agreement for the development of the St. Lawrence, both for navigation and power purposes, so as to permit free passage of ocean-going ships from the Atlantic Ocean to the head of the Great Lakes and into the heart of the American Continent, and make available the development of this great potential source of electric energy for necessary public use; and

"Whereas the Presidents of the United States for the past 31 years have committed themselves to the development of the St. Lawrence River and President Harry S. Truman has characterized the St. Lawrence project as of economic value comparable to the Panama Canal and a vital necessity as a defense measure; and

"Whereas world developments of the past few months and the existence of the present national emergency require in the national defense the development of this inland waterway as an additional means of transportation for the great industries located on the Great Lakes and the agriculture of the northwest States; and

"Whereas, the State of Minnesota, through its legislature, for the last 31 years, has affirmed its continued support of this project; and through the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Commission of Minnesota has continuously promoted the development of the St. Lawrence River, believing that the project is a vital necessity for the stimulation and development of the resources of this State and of the entire Northwest, as well as a great economic advantage to the Nation, and that the project has already been too long delayed: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the senate, the house of representatives concurring, commend and support the President of the United States in his steadfast, consistent and energetic support of this project, and urge the Congress of the United States, without further delay, to take all measures necessary to bring about the speedy completion of this great project as a vital defense and economic necessity; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the President, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

"C. ELMER ANDERSON,
"JOHN A. HARTLE,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY LEADERSHIP—RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received an important resolution from the Wisconsin Council of Churches pointing out America's heavy responsibilities to continue to provide international leadership through the United Nations. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the armament races by separate sovereign states have been and are now an unsatisfactory means for the settlement of international disputes and as now developed threaten the destruction of society, and whereas, we believe that our Nation has no alternative but to build up its armed strength so long as the United Nations does not have the power to give all nations security, and whereas, the strengthening of the United Nations so that it may unite the peoples of the earth in peace and justice while preserving the freedom of different peoples to pursue their separate ways of life would represent the implementation of our Christian faith in the brotherhood of man: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Wisconsin Council of Churches call on the Congress and the President of the United States to declare that it is a fundamental objective of the foreign policy of the United States to support and strengthen the United Nations, with defined and limited powers adequate to preserve peace and prevent aggression through the enactment, incorporation, and enforcement of world law. Be it further resolved that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of our Wisconsin Representatives in Congress and to our United States Senators.

ACTIVITIES OF SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE—RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN ASSOCIATION OF SOIL CONSERVATION DISTRICT SUPERVISORS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received an important resolution from the Secretary of the Wisconsin Association of Soil Conservation District Supervisors, Herbert Myer, of Baraboo, Wis. This resolution was adopted at the February 1 meeting in Madison of this association and it pertains to the vital subject of the continued activities of the Soil Conservation Service in the United States Department of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN ASSOCIATION OF SOIL CONSERVATION
DISTRICT SUPERVISORS,
Baraboo, Wis., February 2, 1951.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: As secretary of the Wisconsin Association of Soil Conservation District Supervisors, representing 61 county-wide districts in the State, I have been instructed to transmit to you the following resolution:

"Whereas conservation of our soil and water resources is essential to the vigorous health and high morale of our people, a strong national defense, and our democratic system of government, is an established and accepted truth; and

"Whereas soil conservation districts, democratically organized and locally controlled local units of State government, have proved to be an effective group through which this vitally important national assignment can be accomplished; and

"Whereas soil conservation district supervisors have secured excellent cooperation from State and Federal agencies and organizations, particularly the Soil Conservation Service, in working toward a well-rounded program of proper land use and soil and water conservation, and since continuation of this essential work is dependent on keeping a strong and adequately financed Soil Conservation Service; and

"Whereas rumors in the press indicate that various reorganization ideas are under consideration which would weaken or destroy the direct technical assistance the Soil Conservation Service is giving districts: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Wisconsin Members of Congress and the United States Secretary of Agriculture be informed that soil conservation district supervisors in assembly at a State meeting in Madison, Wis., on February 1, 1951, hereby enthusiastically endorse the work of the Soil Conservation Service and do further petition that this agency be administratively strengthened, kept a separate bureau in the United States Department of Agriculture, given full responsibility for Federal help on soil and water conservation, and given adequate appropriations to take care of technical needs of farmers of the Nation through the medium of our soil conservation districts."

Your consideration and support of our resolution will be greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,
HERBERT R. MEYER,
Secretary.

SUPPORT OF UNITED NATIONS—RESOLUTION BY CITIZENS OF ARLINGTON, TEX.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a document entitled "The Arlington Resolution." This is a resolution adopted by a group of prominent citizens of Arlington, Tex., urging the revitalization and strengthening of the United Nations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas we, the citizens of Arlington, Tex., recognize the grave situation that threatens our American way of life: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we will support with our every effort every member of our national administration and of the Congress who will put aside all party politics and remember that his first duty in this crisis is to America and the American people. To this end, we stand ready to do our full share, pay our part, and give our lives, if need be; and be it further

Resolved, That we expect our Congress to take immediate steps toward revitalizing and strengthening the United Nations into an effective force to halt aggression and establish and preserve world peace, with each member nation contributing its fair and proportionate share; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon our neighbors throughout our Nation to support the principles embodied in this resolution so that, through our united efforts and our prayers to Almighty God, our way of life will be preserved for our children and our children's children.

UNCLAIMED MONEY IN THE TREASURY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and I ask that I may have 5 minutes in which to explain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred and, without objection, the Senator from North Dakota may proceed.

The resolution (S. Res. 73) submitted by Mr. LANGER was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to unclaimed moneys, bonds, and other securities in the Treasury of the United States with a view to ascertaining the extent to which the inability of the Treasury Department to determine and locate the persons entitled to payment of such moneys, bonds, or other securities is due to a lack of a sufficient number of civil-service employees qualified to perform such duties.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the United States Treasury today has nearly $2,000,000,000 of unclaimed moneys belonging to individuals from every State in the Union, to which the Treasury has no title, and under the law cannot use as a result of a Supreme Court decision because it is the escheatable property of the State in which these funds originated.

Under this decision, United States v. Klein (303 U. S. 276) it is plainly stated that the Federal Government has no power of escheat of unclaimed moneys, but that unclaimed moneys in the Federal Treasury belong to the State in which these unclaimed funds originated.

Some of these moneys have accumulated and been lying in the United States Treasury since 1790. Some are unclaimed Civil War bonds. Some are unclaimed Liberty bonds and Victory notes from World War I. Some are Armed Forces leave bonds, United States savings bonds, Treasury tax and savings notes, Treasury savings certificates, Treasury bills, certificates of indebtedness at various interest rates, which are carried in the daily statement of the United States Treasury, in the first statement of each month under the heading "Matured debt on which interest has ceased" and "Debt bearing no interest."

The total of these unclaimed securities as of January 2, 1951, was $561,734,147.76. In addition to these unclaimed securities of the Federal Government, there are many millions of dollars of unclaimed tax rebates which, under the Supreme Court decision, belong to the State in which the unclaimed funds originated. There are unclaimed Federal court funds in every State in the Union which have been remitted to the Treasury yearly by the clerks of each district court since these courts were organized and which, under the Supreme Court decision referred to above, have been adjudicated as belonging to the State in which the funds originated.

There are approximately 22 categories of these unclaimed amounts, with a possible total of $2,000,000,000, which would enrich the school funds of every State in the Union in an entirely legal manner at a time when the States are struggling so hard to maintain their high standard of education in this period of tremendously rising costs.

At least two States in the Union, Florida and California, have already passed laws on the subject and are claiming these unclaimed Federal funds but are being opposed at every step, in spite of the Supreme Court decision referred to, by which Pennsylvania secured title to unclaimed Federal court funds in that State.

Of the $561,734,147.76 in bonds referred to, the unclaimed amounts are increasing at the present time by roughly $100,000,000 a year. This rapid increase is due to approximately $55,000,000,000 of E-bonds outstanding, a small portion of which, for various reasons, never appear for redemption. The unclaimed securities category is expected to reach at least $1,000,000,000 by the time these 10-year bonds mature.

It is likely that after the States get their share of approvable claims, a large proportion of this $2,000,000,000 will be left, and provision should be made whereby that sum could be prorated among the States.

It is my further belief that this entire matter ought to be investigated, and I have, therefore, submitted today a resolution to ascertain how much of this money belongs to civil-service employees, whether there are sufficient employees in the civil service properly to untangle this matter so that from this involved bookkeeping it may be ascertained how much each State is entitled to receive, and whether it is necessary to have more civil-service employees work on this matter.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement rendered by the Federal Treasury as of January 2, 1951, may be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMBAT PAY FOR INFANTRYMEN IN KOREA

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, there is now pending before the Armed Services Committee of the Senate a bill (S. 579) which would provide combat pay of $50 a month additional for enlisted men and $100 a month for officers on duty in Korea. This bill is designed to correct an injustice of the current Army pay system under which the infantryman, who endures the greatest hardships, receives no additional compensation, while members of other services, such as the Air Force and the submarine service, draw extra pay for hazardous duty. Needless to say, I hope this matter will receive the early and favorable attention of the Armed Services Committee.

In connection with the subject matter of the bill, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two excerpts from the newspaper column of Mr. Drew Pearson.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EN ROUTE TO WASHINGTON.—Under the current Army pay system, the real heroes in the Korean war are drawing the least pay. They don't even get a fair share of the glory when the publicity and medals are dished out.

These unsung heroes are the infantrymen, who form the Army's battering ram, but who are not paid as much as the technical men and pencil pushers behind the lines.

It used to be that infantrymen could collect $10 extra each month for combat work. If they wore the combat infantryman's badge, it was good for a $10 monthly bonus. However, even this has been taken away from them in Korea, despite the fact that combat airmen and submarine men still draw $20 to $75 per month extra for hazardous duty.

Meanwhile, it's the infantrymen who feel the bite of enemy bullets, who slog through mud, sleep in foxholes, and live on cold K rations, who have little chance to take a bath, see a movie, attend church, write letters, or sleep with their shoes off.

Nevertheless, in Korea, the average monthly pay of a man in an infantry rifle company is $135, compared with $226 for an Air Force combat crew man and $172 for a submarine crew.

Highest-paid troops in the Army are ordnance men, followed by signal corps, armored force, quartermaster, antiaircraft, field artillery, engineers, medical, and, last on the list, the infantry.

It's the same story with other awards. During World War II, infantrymen suffered 70 percent of the casualties but got only 11.6 percent of the medals. The Air Force was decorated with 76.2 percent of the medals, while other branches got the remaining 12.2 percent.

Now that the Korean war is nearly won, the Army should give fair pay and recognition to the foot soldiers who did the slugging and the slogging.

Senator LONG TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, in addition to helping steer United States foreign policy, is never too busy to fight for the little fellow. He is now about to win an important financial victory for American doughboys in Korea.

On October 21, Senator CONNALLY spotted an item in the Washington Merry-Go-Round which read:

"Under the current Army pay system, the real heroes in the Korean war are drawing the least pay. They don't even get a fair share of the glory when the publicity and medals are dished out.

"These unsung heroes are the infantrymen, who form the Army's battering ram, but who are not paid as much as the technical men and pencil pushers behind the lines.

'It used to be that infantrymen could collect $10 extra each month for combat work. If they wore the combat infantryman's badge, it was good for a $10 monthly bonus. However, even this has been taken away from them in Korea."

Senator CONNALLY clipped the column and sent it to the Army, together with a letter wanting to know why combat men were being discriminated against. He has now received a letter from the Army indicating that it would urge a $50 bonus monthly for combat enlisted men, with $100 a month for officers.

What the Army told Senator CONNALLY in summary follows:

"The Department of the Army recognizes the plight of the infantrymen who in past wars and in the Korean operation have borne the brunt of the fighting. We intend to do everything possible to give the deserved recognition and compensation to those combat fighters upon whom the success of all our military efforts ultimately depends.

"From the standpoint of extra compensation for the combat fighter, the Army has prepared and submitted to the Department of Defense a proposal to ask Congress for extra pay for each month of combat duty in Korea. The Department of Defense has indicated considerable interest and we anticipate early submission of the proposal to Congress."

PROPOSAL TO DRAFT 18-YEAR-OLD YOUTHS—LETTER FROM SHEBOYGAN (WIS.) COUNCIL OF PARENTS AND TEACHERS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in Wisconsin, as throughout the rest of the country, there is a tremendous interest and controversy on the subject of the drafting of 18-year-old youngsters. Naturally, this issue touches the heart of every parent, in addition to affecting veterans and other large groups.

I believe that a letter which I received a few days ago from the Sheboygan, Wis., Council of Parent-Teachers Association well expresses views on at least one side of this picture which have come to me from other P.-T. A.'s and from numerous educators throughout Wisconsin.

I would not, of course, attempt at this time to offer a final evaluation of this subject, because, like my colleagues, I am naturally awaiting the expert report of the Senate Armed Services Committee. I feel, however, that this Sheboygan communication is very indicative of widespread sentiment. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the text of this letter be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHEBOYGAN COUNCIL OF PARENTS AND TEACHERS,
SHEBOYGAN, WIS., January 26, 1951.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: In view of the fact that at present there is a bill before the Congress of the United States to draft 18-year-old young men for military service, and realizing we are not in a position to know whether or not our country really needs the 18-year-olds for our country's service, we, the Sheboygan Council of Parents and Teachers, wish to urge that a provision be made to insure that each young 18- or 19-year-old student have a chance to finish his high-school course before entering military service.

Very few young men in our community, and in many others, finish high school before becoming 18 and many are 19 years old because of regulations relative to entering school or for various other reasons during their primary and secondary education. We cannot overlook the many advantages of a high-school education, not only to the young man himself, but also to our country as a whole. To insure the young men a high-school education is to strengthen our country's defense. He may then look forward to higher education or work in the field of his choice upon discharge from the military service.

Our group represents a true cross-section of parents and teachers in our community of more than 40,000 population and we feel a definite need for such a provision which will be a constructive step forward toward ultimate peace, which is the thought uppermost in the minds of all of us today.

We wish to commend the action of Congress in regard to college students being able to finish their terms at present and would like to count on a provision being included in the present bill before Congress to insure the opportunity which would enable the 18- or 19-year-olds to finish high school in the event a bill to draft 18-year-old young men is passed.

As a chosen representative of the people, your leadership and action relative to this matter is desired.

Yours truly.

ADDRESS BY EX-PRESIDENT HOOVER

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on last Friday evening ex-President Hoover made a very important contribution to the so-called great debate on American foreign policy. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the address, as published in the New York Times, be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, I have been urged by many thousands of you to again discuss with you our foreign policy.

A responsibility rests upon me to speak out from 50 years of personal experience with most of the peoples of the free world and with Russia and China. I have been entrusted during 35 years with high responsibilities by my countrymen.

I should like to address you through the rose-colored spectacles of idealism and the need of free nations to defend freemen.

But I would be doing my country a disservice if I did not take into account the realities in this endangered world.

There is nothing sacrosanct about foreign policies, as witness the tombstones which have been erected over many of them in the last 10 years. They bear the inscriptions "Undeclared war, the alliance with Stalin, Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, dismantling of German peacetime industry, the promoting of Mao Tse-tung."

Many men, including myself, have demanded the revison of these policies at each wrong turning.

The rightness of our many proposals has been proved by time. I shall recall only two of them for your test.

Seventeen years ago, as President, I refused recognition of the Soviet government. I knew from ample experience, and their own documents, that this bloody conspiracy against mankind would flood our country through this open door with fifth columns and spies; that they would sabotage our national life and Government. Every American knows they have done just that.

ADVICE ON STALIN AND HITLER

About 10 years ago, on June 29, 1941, in a great crisis I urged the revision of our policies to meet the greatest danger that had come to the American people.

Mr. Roosevelt had proposed a tacit alliance of the United States with Stalin and his Communist Russia. Britain was then safe because of the diversion of Hitler's armies to an attack on Russia: A few sentences from that address were:

"Now we find ourselves promising aid to Stalin and his militant Communist conspiracy against the whole democratic ideals of the world. * * *

"It makes the whole argument of our joining the war to bring the "four freedoms" to mankind a gargantuan jest. * * *

"If we go further and join the war and we win, then we have won for Stalin the grip of communism on Russia and more opportunity for it to extend in this world."

I said these two dictators—Stalin and Hitler—were locked in deadly combat, that statesmanship required the United States to stand aside in watchful waiting, armed to the teeth; that the day would come when these nations "will be sufficiently exhausted to listen to the military, economic, and moral powers of the United States and at that moment and that moment only can the United States promote a just and lasting peace."

Remember this was in June 1941, almost 10 years ago. Need I remind you that the grip of communism in this decade has spread slavery from 200,000,000 to 800,000,000 people? And we have no peace.

I could recall a dozen more instances, some within the past 12 months.

SIX FACTORS TO BE APPRAISED

In order to reach any conclusions as to the wise course for America to pursue in the critical issues which confront us we must again and again appraise the constantly shifting forces moving in the world.

The problems which we face are of far larger dimensions than the current discussion on sending contingents of American boys to Europe.

Their appraisal must also include:

1. Land war strengths.
2. The defense of the American people and the Western Hemisphere.
3. Our economic capacity over a long period.
4. The United Nations.
5. Our policies in the Far East.
6. The North Atlantic military alliance.

Policies in these six categories cannot be separated from each other—they are all interlocked.

We must appraise the somber facts around these points before we can map a national direction. We must not shrink from clear-minded appraisal of our strengths, our weaknesses, and the attainment of the purposes to which the Congress has committed us.

GROUND FORCES COMPARED

We may again appraise as best we can the present military strengths for land war in the world.

I am fully aware of the shortcomings of the term "divisions" as a measuring device for comparative military strength, but it is the nearest to a common descriptive unit that we have.

The Kremlin-directed horde has under arms and in reserves probably 300 combat divisions, with 30,000 tanks. I am now told they have over 20,000 mostly tactical planes and they have with their satellites 50,000,000 men available for cannon fodder.

In World War II, when Russia was without the satellites, the Germans failed with 240 well-equipped divisions to overcome her. With her allies of General Manpower, General Space, General Winter, and General Scorched Earth, she had stopped the Germans even before lend-lease had reached her.

The nations of Europe in the Atlantic Pact have at the present moment less than 20 equipped and trained combat divisions available for European action.

There is here a stark reality upon which our foreign policies must be based. With any seeable land forces from non-Communist nations, even including the United States, a land offensive against the Communists could bring no military victory, no political conclusion. But that does not mean that there are no other methods of stopping the Kremlin's ambitions.

The second stark realism upon which our foreign policies must be based is the defense of the Western Hemisphere. Its defense is not only in our interests but in the interests of free men eveywhere.

Much criticism is offered, even to a discussion of this question. An atmosphere of hurry, rush, anxiety is being developed the effect of which is to make it difficult, if not impossible, for the American people to judge their own situation.

I may say at once that with proper economic action this hemisphere can be made self-contained in critical raw materials. From a long professional career and from years as Secretary of Commerce dealing with such questions, I might qualify in this field.

Further, unless we so dissipate our strength as to become a beaten and crushed people, we will be able to keep sea lanes open.

Moreover, this hemisphere can be defended from Communist armies, come what will. It is still surrounded with a great moat. To transport such invading armies either 3,000 miles across the Atlantic or 6,000 miles across the Pacific would require transport ships and naval protection which the Russians do not possess and could not build or seize, no matter what further countries they occupy.

If we have a proper naval and air strength, we could sink them in midocean. With somewhat more attention paid to our defense, this would apply to invasion via the Bering Straits. Hitler could not even cross the English Channel. Atomic bombs do not transport troops over the ocean.

Communist armies can no more get to Washington than any allied armies can get to Moscow.

No responsible military man denies these two conclusions.

The American people should not be frightened into rash action by fear that we cannot survive. I am not advocating isolationism. But if other nations should fail, we may be isolated by force of circumstance and against our will.

We might go into a period hard to endure, but this Nation can stick it out.

STRAIN ON ECONOMIC CAPACITY

The third stark realism upon which our policies must be built is our economic capacity. The bleak outlook of the world may well last more than a decade—possibly two of them.

The new budget calls for Federal spending of over $71,000,000,000. This $71,000,000,000 alone, plus state and local expenditures, is about 37 percent of our national income.

That is beyond the long endurance of any nation and fatal to the preservation of a system of free men.

The President has asked for a large increase of taxes. We will need also to increase State and local government taxes.

This burden is going to fall on people with smaller incomes. The proof of this is easy.

If all personal incomes above the level of a United States Senator were confiscated it would yield only about $2,500,000,000 of additional revenues. But confiscation would stop most people earning the $2,000,000,000. We must also remember that excise and corporation taxes in most part are ultimately passed on to the consumer or these milch cows would die.

Grim austerity must enter the door of every American home.

Even before these burdens are actually imposed there are stark signs of economic strain. The purchasing power of the dollar has fallen 20 percent in 6 months. The stock boom indicates that many people are seeking flight from inflation.

Our already gigantic Government debts permit little expansion without inflation of credit. Two wars prove economic controls cannot wholly stop inflation. The surest road away from inflation is to accept the President's wise proposals to "pay as you go."

But we simply cannot carry this expenditure or such tax load for long.

Spending, taxing, and inflation of ourselves into exhaustion is one of the means by which Stalin hopes to overcome the United States.

The economic destruction of the United States is one of the means by which Stalin hopes to overcome us.

UNITED NATIONS COMMITMENTS

The fourth focal point of our thinking must be the United Nations.

Our stark reality here is the lack of cohesion and unity in the free nations. Even some of our European allies are anxious to appease the Chinese branch of the Kremlin on policies of the United Nations.

Despite this, we must not forget that the aspiration of mankind for over a century has been to find peace by collective action against aggressors. The United Nations was built on this same central idea as the concert of Europe and the League of Nations. Halting and faulty as it may be, we cannot abandon this idea and this hope.

But it must be clear that the UN for the present will not be a substantial protection from Communist aggression.

Our men are holding heroically to the mission assigned us by the United Nations in Korea. We are suffering great losses. General Marshall says we must send 15,000 men a month. We cannot yet see the end. But if we were to drive all the enemy out of Korea, how much of our armies must remain there to protect it?

Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines are vital links in our national security. This must not be minimized by nations anxious to direct our energies to Europe. We will need to retain much military strength in the Pacific to protect those areas.

Certainly there is little stark reality in talking about American ground divisions in Europe in view of our involvement in Asia.

ATTACK AS SIGNAL FOR TROOPS

The sixth consideration in our decisions revolves around the North Atlantic Pact and the proposals to start another American expeditionary land army to Europe.

Current statements stretch this pact far beyond its text. The pact provides that the nations shall aid each other in case of attack. There has been no attack.

Moreover, at the time of ratification of that alliance the administration, through the Secretary of State and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, gave positive assurances that under the pact no expeditions of American ground troops would be sent to Europe.

That certainly meant no forces to Europe prior to attack. Our participation, prior to an attack, was to be limited to munitions. The pact being the will of the American people through the Congress, and in the faith of the text and those assurances, I supported the alliance.

But last fall it became evident that the Administration was contemplating sending ground troops to Europe.

It was also evident that after years of gigantic American subsidies, the European Atlantic Pact nations had done nothing of consequence toward their own defense. Former Prime Minister Churchill had repeatedly and forthrightly stated this fact—the last occasion being only a few weeks ago.

I made two addresses in protest. Judging by the scolding of the European press, I may have helped to start them thinking.

Then General Eisenhower was appointed to organize their military strength. And the general has become the potent symbol of the policy of at once sending American ground troops to Europe.

The American people are indebted to General Eisenhower for many great services. He has magnificent fitness both for the command and the stimulation of spirit and action among the allies in Europe.

But his appointment does not commit the American people as to policy.

EUROPE AS RUSSIA'S CHOICE

The stark realities in western continental Europe are their large Communist parties and the disunities which gnaw at their vitals. Their prejudices prevent taking Spain into the alliance with 20 divisions and the most defensible area in Europe. For some reason Turkey and Greece are excluded from the alliance.

Equally vital is the fact that there is little hope of adequate land defense of Europe without West German participation. Two months ago detailed plans and great progress were announced. Now it is decided that West German military participation is out or can wait.

From press reports based on information from European officials and from General Eisenhower's statements, it would appear that his army, including the two American divisions now in Germany, would start with 9 or possibly 10 divisions; by the end of 2 years, including American divisions, it would seem to be 35 or 40 divisions.

The stark reality is that such an army is small compared to the strength of the enemy.

America is at present the major deterrent to the Kremlin's ambitions of world conquest. There is nothing that Stalin would like more than to get the United States into his clutches by fighting us on the ground in Europe. There lies his overwhelming strength.

Disaster could thus come to the American Hemisphere with no salvation to Europe.

The American people should have more information before they risk trying a third expedition of ground troops to Europe.

Any defense line in Europe must be over 400 miles long. Will our responsible leaders make a public statement that the forces so far proposed can defend this line against odds of 3 or 4 to 1? We have tried this in Korea.

Will our responsible leaders tell us whether they contemplate the proposed American contingent as only an installment? Does not this contribution and our huge increase in the Army budget imply many more American divisions? Do the American people know all the facts?

AIR-SEA POWER AS DECISIVE

Despite all these stark realities and these problems, I have believed there is a way to at least an uneasy peace for the world.

In my address of 6 weeks ago, I stated that we should not land men or send money to Europe until large European forces were in sight. I was well aware of the obligation assumed by Congress to give aid in case of attack. It was my view that we should hold to that provision of the pact and I urged "arming our Air and Navy to the teeth."

I suggest that air power and the Navy is the alternative to sending American land divisions to Europe. With our gigantic productive capacity and within our economic strength we can build and sustain overwhelming air and sea forces held on our home ground ready in case of attack.

Stalin well knows we could carry on that kind of war for his destruction for indefinite years.

The air threat has been during 4 years the most powerful deterrent to any attack on Western Europe. It is far more powerful than pouring American divisions into the reach of this Asiatic horde.

I am suggesting no attack. I am suggesting the very protection for Western Europe and our own defense which the Senate contemplated when it ratified the Atlantic Pact.

There are other reasons for such a policy—both military and economic.

LESSON OF STRATEGY IN KOREA

Manifestly if attack on Europe came, the free world would be inferior in ground forces. Such a ground war would at best be a war of defense. In the air we would have the offensive. An air force has range, speed, flexibility and striking power which can come nearer gaining a decision than allied ground armies.

Especially is this true, for in an air war the Communist horde would be without a large part of its ground allies—General Manpower, General Space, General Winter, and General Scorched Earth.

The whole Korean tragedy is developing proof that the way to punish aggressors is from the air and sea and not by land armies. It would be indefinitely less costly in dead and disaster.

The unbearable strain on our economic system will come from trying to do five things at the same time. That is, to maintain armies in the Pacific; to build up an air force; a naval force; to furnish munitions to nations who are determined to defend themselves; and to sent land armies to Europe. Our economy cannot carry this load for long.

I can give you an indication of the lesser economic strain to attain the same or more power by air than ground forces.

To train, equip, place in Europe, and maintain for 1 year 10 of the usual combinations of American divisions would cost about $4,500,000,000. This same sum would for example, purchase and man 390 B-26 long-range bombers compared to 60 of them at present. If neither went into battle, the annual cost of the 10 divisions would be about $3,000,000,000, and that of such a segment of the air force less than $1,000,000,000.

POLICY REVISIONS PROPOSED

I can most clearly state the points of foreign policies in which many of us believe at this time by summarizing a program. No program can be perfect—none without risk. For the present I suggest:

1. We should devote our overwhelming productive power to air and naval strength and supply of munitions.

2. If the Europeans are attacked, we should be prepared and use such overwhelming air and naval power to the limit and keep it up until they have had enough. The Kremlin knows that we are committed by the Congress to do so. I believe that reserve, if large enough, is Europe's real protection.

3. We should supply munitions to nations doing their utmost to defend themselves.

4. From the starkly realistic, economic, political and military reasons which I have given you, my personal conviction is that we should not create land armies for expeditions into the quicksands of either Europe or China. I do not want to even start on the road to another Korea.

5. There are those who think we should send more divisions to Europe for their encouragement even before there is an attack. To them, I urge watchful waiting until much more military strength has been developed by Europe itself and there is more evidence they have resolved their disunities.

6. We must reduce our national expenditures to a level we can carry over a long term of years, and at the same time avoid economic disaster which can destroy freedom in America.

Senator BYRD estimates that $8,600,000,000 of proposed nondefense expenditures in the budget could be reduced or postponed. We should spend all we can afford on air, navy, and munitions rather than large armies.

FOR BACKING CHIANG KAI-SHEK

7. We can and must defend Formosa, the Philippines, and Japan. We can do it by naval and air forces.

As to Korea, we should demand of the United Nations that they call for a stop of supplies to Communist China by the non-Communist nations.

Since Red China is making war on our American armies, we should free Chiang Kai-shek to do what he wishes in China and furnish him munitions.

8. I proposed 3 years ago that we should give full independence to Japan and Western Germany under representative governments. During 100 years these nations were the great dams against these Russian-controlled hordes.

In the last war we may have been engaged in a great crusade for freedom of mankind, but we certainly destroyed these two dams. The sooner they are given their independence the sooner, for their own security, they will resume their ancient role.

9. Recently I proposed that if the nations of Europe failed we should, as a prudent nation, have in mind a second line of air and naval defense based upon the foreign shores of the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans both north and south, and I may add the Mediterranean and Indian Ocean.

10. Congress should recover its constitutional authority over starting wars. It could certainly do so through its powers over the purse.

PROGRAM FOR RESTRAINING FOES

I have proposed no retreat, no withdrawal. I have proposed no repudiation of treaties or obligations. Rather I have proposed that the pledges to the Congress and the American people be kept. I have proposed that we stop, look, and listen before we start on a road of land war that risks the loss of all civilization.

I propose no good to Stalin. His greatest hope is to get us into a land war.

Before we go off the deep end of steps toward another land war in Europe, let us remember that we fought two such wars hoping to bring peace and we have no peace.

We should be prepared to make heavy sacrifices to help. But we should do it with common sense, within our strength, with the long view of history in mind.

The essence of the program I have proposed is to effectively restrain our enemies from attack upon our allies or ourselves. It is the best chance of peace—even if it is an uneasy peace.

If we pursue the lines of our own genius and resources, we can meet this—the greatest menace of a century.

And being in the right the Almighty is on our side.

CONTROVERSY BETWEEN THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM AND THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make a 3-minute statement preliminary to the introduction of some matters into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Michigan may proceed.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, one of the most important questions affecting the stability of the economy of the Nation today is that which has arisen as a result of the differences between the views of the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury. While these differences do not command the attention which has been given to the more dramatic debate on foreign policy, there are those of us who believe that their impact may be almost as telling on our ability to remain free.

The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] received last week a copy of a statement prepared by Hon. James K. Vardaman, Jr., a member of the Federal Reserve Board, intended to set forth Governor Vardaman's position in the dispute. With his statement, Governor Vardaman enclosed a covering note, asking for the comment of the Senator receiving it. At the request of the Senator from Ohio I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Vardaman, together with the note accompanying it, the reply to Mr. Vardaman by the Senator from Ohio and five articles by respected columnists commenting on the matter. These articles are: Politics in Finance, by Marquis Childs, from the Washington Post of February 7; McCabe Holds Power in Fight With Snyder; Dare He Use It?, by J. A. Livingston, from the Washington Post of February 8; Mr. Walter Lippmann's columns entitled "Today and Tomorrow," from the Washington Post of February 8 and February 12; and a column entitled "Fighting Fire With Gasoline," by Mr. Henry Hazlitt, from the February 5 edition of Newsweek magazine.

There being no objection the letters and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOARD OF GOVERNORS
OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
February 5, 1951.

Memorandum to Senator BRICKER:

There is enclosed a statement which I issued to the press today giving my impressions of what happened at the meeting between the President of the United States and the Federal Open Market Committee of the Federal Reserve System at the White House at 4 p. m. on January 31; and also stating what I believe the Federal Reserve Board should say and do in connection with the financing program of the Government as officially promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I would sincerely appreciate it if you would read this statement in its entirety and give me the benefit of any comment you may care to make.

J. K. V.

STATEMENT BY GOV. JAMES K. VARDAMAN, JR., MEMBER OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD, FEBRUARY 5, 1951

Never having regarded membership on the Federal Reserve Board as a speaking part, I have made only three short public talks and given about the same number of interviews in nearly 5 years' service on the Board. However, in the present situation where an apparent attempt is being made to question the veracity of the Presidency in its dealings with this Board I feel that it is only fair to give my impressions of what has happened and what the conduct of this Board should be.

After the meeting between the Federal Open Market Committee and the President at the White House at 4 p. m. January 31, the Committee, consisting of all seven members of the Federal Reserve Board and the presidents of five Federal Reserve banks, returned to the Board's quarters and went into executive session. The suggestion was made that a written memorandum of what took place in the White House should be prepared, and Chairman McCabe requested Governor Evans to undertake that task. The preliminary draft of Governor Evans' memorandum which was released to the press by Governor Eccles without authorization of the Board or the Committee had not been approved by the Federal Reserve Board members nor all of the members of the Federal Open Market Committee. It was thought to be correct in all essential details but certain minor changes had been suggested. Governor Evans had prepared the memorandum from memory without notes. There were no notes taken at the meeting with the President so far as I know.

Governor Evans' memorandum was correct in essential details as to the words which were spoken during the meeting with the President, but the memorandum did not attempt to set forth the impressions and general atmosphere prevailing during the meeting. My own impression of the meeting was that the President of the United States had been allowed to leave the conference room with the definite impression in his heart and mind that the Federal Open Market Committee would support the Government financing and bond program as officially promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury on January 18. I said to the Committee that I thought it was tragic that the President had been allowed to leave the conference with such an impression when the majority of the Committee apparently knew at the time they were not going to carry out the President's wishes.

On January 29, 2 days before the meeting with the President, I submitted a written memorandum to the members of the Federal Reserve Board and on the 31st to the Open Market Committee suggesting that the Board make the following public statement:

"The Federal Reserve Board has made its recommendations to the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with the interest rate on short-term Government obligations and also with reference to the interest rate and maturities on funding and refunding bonds. In the exercise of his statutory authority and obligation, the Secretary has not thought it wise to follow all of the suggestions made by this Board in connection with these matters. Acting in his official capacity, as the spokesman for the Government, the Secretary has announced a financing program, and this Board has nothing further to say on the questions involved other than to state quite firmly and clearly that the Board will support to the fullest extent of its authority the program as officialy promulgated by the United States Treasury.

"Whenever it is in line with its statutory authority to do so, the Board will advise with the Secretary on all matters relating to the management of the public debt or any other questions which he may desire to discuss. But it should be clearly understood that under our constitutional framework and present statutory laws, the management of the public debt is the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury and this Board will support him to the utmost of its ability in his officially declared programs and actions.

"We believe the duty of this Board to be to make its ideas available and known in council, but not to make such ideas prevail and the Board will act in accordance with this belief in the present situation."

The Board and the committee refused to consider the issuance of any such statement in spite of the fact that it was generally thought that Chairman McCabe had given President Truman every reason to believe that the Committee and Board would support the Government financing program.

As long as the questions involved were in the negotiation stage I felt it to be the duty of the Board to present and argue its ideas with the Secretary of the Treasury, and if necessary with the President. But once the Secretary of the Treasury, as the official spokesman for the Government on debt management, had promulgated the Government program I felt strongly that this Board should give such program its wholehearted support personally and officially. The question of statutory prerogatives and personal feelings should be subordinated to the all-important necessity of supporting the Government and the Presidency in this time of national emergency. For myself I unhesitatingly waive any theoretical statutory authority and prerogatives in order to support the Government and the Presidency at this time; and if there is any question in my mind as to the propriety of such a waiver I will try to appear before the proper congressional committee to ask for clarification of my statutory responsibilities as a member of the Board.

February 7, 1951.

The Honorable JAMES K. VARDAMAN, Jr.,
Board of Governors,
Federal Reserve System,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. VARDAMAN: This will acknowledge receipt of your statement of February 5, 1951, and the attached memorandum requesting any comment that I might care to make.

The first part of your statement relates to your version of what took place at the January 31 conference between the President and the Federal Open Market Committee. Naturally, I cannot determine whether your report of that conference or the report of Governor Evans is correct. However, the aftermath of confusion which has followed a conference intended to clarify matters convinces me that the President has failed to grasp the basic issues of fiscal policy which are at the bottom of the dispute between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board.

Your statement makes it clear that you feel that the Board should support the financing and bond program advocated by Secretary Snyder. If this opinion is based on economic rather than legal considerations, I do not question your right to advance it. My own view is that the Treasury's fiscal policies will result in disastrous inflation. Since May 1950 the Board's holdings of Government securities have increased by $3,500,000,000, which in turn has led to a sixfold expansion of credit. The proposal that the Board should continue to support the Treasury's cheap-money policies has been accurately described by Mr. Henry Hazlitt as "fighting fire with gasoline."

The concluding paragraph of your statement is one of the most amazing ever uttered by a public official in recent years. You say: "The question of statutory prerogatives * * * should be subordinated to the all-important necessity of supporting the Government and the Presidency in this national emergency." The meaning of this euphemism is that the laws passed by Congress should be disregarded whenever the President feels that the national emergency so requires. I am unalterably opposed to that sort of totalitarian philosophy either in war or in peace.

You also say in the final paragraph of your statement that you "unhesitantly waive any theoretical statutory authority and prerogatives in order to support the Government and the Presidency at this time." First, I would like to point out that the laws of the United States are not "theoretical" for 150,000,000 American people. They must obey them or go to jail. By what right do you presume to waive statutory authority in violation of your oath of office?

Finally, I invite your attention to the fact that the Federal Reserve System is accountable to the Congress, and not to the Presidency as you suggest. Congress has not charged the Board with the duty of supporting the price of Government securities, but, rather, with the duty of supporting the value of the dollar.

Until such time as the duties of the Board may be changed by act of Congress, I trust that you will see the impropriety of your suggested waiver of statutory authority and prerogatives.

Sincerely yours.

POLITICS IN FINANCE

(By Marquis Childs)

HOW NOT TO STOP INFLATION

As the roulette wheel of inflation continues to spin, checked somewhat but not stopped by the wage-price freeze, there are events in the news which have an ominous meaning. The following developments have a bearing on whether the wheel is to be stopped or whether the reckless gamble is to go on.

1. The response of Congress to the President's tax recommendations is confirmation of the fear that existed before the program came up for final action. Almost certainly final action will be delayed for several months. There is a widespread determination to cut deeply into the President's $71,000,000,000 budget—which can be healthy if it is not indiscriminate on the defense side.

2. The report of a Senate subcommittee shows how political influence has operated to get loans out of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Professional fixers, in one or two instances former RFC employees, have taken large sums to get loan applications approved.

3. The controversy between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board over Government credit and the interest rate on Government bonds has created doubts as to fiscal policy. Congress, which granted the original powers to the Federal Reserve Board, will have to step in.

For several years reports have circulated about politics determining, in some instances, the loaning policy of the RFC. Details were first supplied in this column on how Merl Young, with his White House connections, stepped from a comparatively minor position in the RFC to a highly paid job as Washington representative of the Lustron Corp., which got a $37,000,000 loan. That loan is in default and the RFC has a doubtful chance to get something back from the assets of the company.

What has happened in the RFC shows the deterioration in standards of administration that has taken place during the past 3 or 4 years. There has been too much indifference toward ordinary integrity, or even the appearance of integrity, in the conduct of Government and the handling of the large sums of money entrusted to Government.

This points up sharply the contest between the Treasury and the White House on one hand and the Federal Reserve Board on the other. For most of us the argument over fiscal policy is in terms that are nearly impossible to understand since they are so far beyond our daily problems of grocery bills and the installment due on the car.

But one thing is perfectly easy to understand. That is President Truman's action in calling the members of the Board to the White House to discuss their policy on Government bonds. What makes this such an unusual act is that Congress specifically gave the Board powers independent of the Treasury to act as an instrument for maintaining the Government's credit relationship with the Nation's banks. Never before has a President taken up directly with the Board the issue of the Board's policy.

After the meeting the White House issued a statement saying that the Board had pledged to maintain the Government's security market at existing levels both as to refunding and new issues. Board Member Marriner Eccles says that no such agreement was reached since, he adds, the President did not raise this point during the discussion.

Secretary of the Treasury John Snyder insists that to raise interest rates on Government securities by half of a percent would cost a billion and a half additional in interest charges. This, Snyder says, would be the next effect of Federal Reserve policy.

Eccles and others on the Board say that the extra interest cost would be nearer $200,000,000 since the rate would be raised only on new issues and not on all Government securities. But even if the cost was considerably greater they argue that it is essential in order to check the flow of credit that is being released through the banks under the present policy.

The Federal Reserve Board has bought $3,500,000,000 in Government bonds since May chiefly from insurance companies and savings banks. This figure should be multiplied by six, it is contended, to get the amount of credit inflation which such action means.

In April of 1948 the President replaced Eccles as Chairman of the Board and named in his place Thomas B. McCabe, a Philadelphia industrialist. Two years before he had made what was generally interpreted as a political appointment in naming his old friend from St. Louis, James K. Vardaman, Jr., to fill a vacancy on the Board. Vardaman had had only limited experience in the banking field.

To permit politics in this field is to invite an explosion that could do almost as much damage as an atomic bomb. With each day that passes it becomes increasingly obvious that the wage-price freeze cannot hold the line against inflation unless it is buttressed by other measures. There should be at this moment a willingness to consider the remedies that, however unpalatable they may be temporarily, have the backing of so many knowledgeable men.

MCCABE HOLDS POWER IN FIGHT WITH SNYDER; DARE HE USE IT?

(By J. A. Livingston)

In the fight between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury, the initiative rests with the Reserve Board if it cares to exercise it. This is true even though President Truman has publicly sided with Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder.

The Reserve Board's Open Market Committee has congressional authority to lower the prices it pays for Government securities. But to do so would run directly counter to Snyder's program of financing rearmament. Will Chairman Thomas B. McCabe risk that? Or will he feel he must resign?

Snyder has laid the groundwork for a knock-down, drag-out fight in Congress—if necessary. In a New York Times interview he berated those "who would have the Government make it possible for the banks to make even bigger profits at a time when industry, business, and labor are asked to forego part of the profits they would realize from defense mobilization." Shades of Andrew Jackson in his fight against the Bank of the United States.

In the row to date, members of the Reserve Board have been dominated by the thought that the country's great internal danger is inflation and that Snyder's policy aggravates it. Commercial banks own $80,000,000,000 of Government securities. If the Board is required, as Snyder demands, to buy these bonds at fixed prices, the banks can—at will—increase their reserves sufficient to expand credit by $360,000,000,000, or seven times the outstanding volume of loans. All the banks have to do is sell their bonds. Thus the volume of credit would be determined by individual banks, and not as Congress intended, by the Reserve Board.

The Reserve Board is quite prepared to maintain a stable market for Government securities. But it wants to be free to let prices drop, so that if banks want to sell, they'll be penalized. Or, to put it the other way, it wants to create an incentive for holding.

As it is now, a bank or insurance company that has purchased a marketable 2½-percent long-term bond can get its money back at any time—from the Federal Reserve—without loss. No holder of American Telephone & Telegraph bonds can expect that. He always runs the risk of loss if he wants to sell. Presumably he buys to hold to maturity.

The Treasury's underlying fear is that once the Reserve Board started to lower the price of Government securities, holders would anticipate the decline and try to beat it. Panic might result. So Snyder would rather keep prices and interest rates fixed and the market settled. In that way, he always knows beforehand what future financing will cost him.

Thus, the real issue is this: Who's boss over the money supply, the Treasury or the Reserve System?

If Snyder prevails in the fight, then the Reserve Board would become an administrative arm of the Treasury. It would clear checks, supervise regulations W and X, examine banks. Some people say that it has already surrendered its independence, that whenever a central bank bucks the Government, it writes its own finish.

The Treasury, then, would be in the anomalous position of being the central bank and the country's biggest borrower at the same time. It would make its own terms on what it borrows and then use its central banking powers to make the loans good.

A face-saving device is conceivable. From time to time, the board has sought additional power to curb bank credit. One recent proposal would "sterilize" all reserves created by Reserve System purchases of Government securities. But Snyder had adhered to the institutional line of former Secretaries of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., and Fred Vinson. They haven't liked to cramp the banks because that might depress the market for Government securities.

Perhaps now Snyder will back a Reserve Board legislative proposal for additional powers to curb bank reserves. The Board could then save face by agreeing to support Snyder's bond market in the manner to which Secretaries of the Treasury, ever since Morgenthau have become accustomed. And a knock-down, drag-out fight in Congress—to determine who's boss—would be avoided. But the conclusion would be plain: Snyder. He'd have the Reserve in Truman's hip pocket.

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

FOR MR. SNYDER TO EXPLAIN

The dispute between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board is not a tempest in a teapot. It is certainly not a personal feud. Nor are there any questions of veracity or honor involved. It is about a question of policy which is fundamental in our mobilization—what to do about the fact that a gigantic military program has been superimposed on the greatest civilian boom in our history.

The Federal Reserve System is appointed by law to see to it that the volume, the cost, and the availability of the total money supply of this country is such as to avoid either a deflation or an inflation. The view of the Federal Reserve Board is that the armament program can be carried out even allowing for an increase of productivity, only by a considerable deflation of the civilian boom. But it is impossible to reduce the civilian boom, indeed it is impossible not to pour oil on the fires of inflation in that boom, if the Federal Reserve System is going to be compelled, as it is now, by the President and the Treasury to buy unlimited amounts of Government bonds at essentially fixed prices—at a 2½-percent rate for long-term marketable bonds.

The view of the Treasury, as stated by Secretary Snyder in his carefully prepared speech of January 18, is that the public credit of the United States depends on keeping the price of Government securities at the 2½-percent level, and that this is of such enormous importance that the Federal Reserve System must manufacture the money to keep on buying the bonds in order to maintain them at that price.

I may say, however, that though the Secretary has stated his views, he has merely stated them dogmatically, without proof and without any serious attempt to reply to the great array of expert opinion which supports the Federal Reserve Board. There is not available at the Treasury as this is written any document which shows how the Treasury thinks the inflation of money, which its policy demands, is to be dealt with.

Perhaps Secretary Snyder can prove his case. But he will have to prove it, not merely to declare it. He will have to prove that policy of manufacturing money to keep the price of Government bonds at a 2½-percent rate does not, as Mr. Eccles says it does, set up "an engine of inflation" which raises all other prices and, therefore, because it devalues the dollar, makes even the apparent stability of Government securities a fiction.

In arguing the Treasury case Mr. Snyder will have to face up to the fact that the dispute is no longer theoretical. The record of the last 6 months of 1950 proves with a conclusiveness that is rare in matters of this sort how inflationary is the Treasury's policy. The record shows that the inflation we have suffered since the Korean war is due to this policy, that as a memorandum from the economists of Chicago University puts it, "the price rise of the last 6 months could almost certainly have been largely or wholly avoided * * * prices would probably be a little above their level in May if the Federal Reserve System had kept its holdings of Government securities unchanged, instead of adding to them by $3,500,000,000." That is a serious and a definite charge made by responsible experts who speak with great authority, and their argument has the support of an overwhelming majority of bankers and theoretical economists.

The inflation since the Korean war began last June has been marked by a rise in personal incomes of about 10 percent, by a rise in wholesale prices of about 11 percent, by a rise in the cost of living of nearly 6 percent.

What caused this inflation? Was it the Government's expenditures for war and rearmament? It was not. During the last 6 months of 1950 the Government actually took in more money than it spent. It had in fact a surplus of nearly two billions in the cash budget. This surplus was due to the fact that the taxes Congress so wisely imposed had begun to yield revenues from the enormous prosperity of the boom before there was time to spend very much of the big appropriations for armaments.

Thus the inflation since Korea has not been caused by the military budget. The budget in fact has been deflationary. What is more, during this same period the Federal Reserve System has lost $1,500,000,000 in gold that went abroad. That also was a deflationary influence.

Nevertheless, despite the deflationary budget and despite the deflationary loss of gold abroad, we have had a lively and extremely disconcerting inflation. What caused it? It was caused by the compulsory manufacture of money in the Federal Reserve System in order to buy those Government securities which the Treasury insisted must be bought at a fixed price. That is what caused the inflation. From May 31 to the end of 1950 the demand deposits of the country—the money in which business is largely transacted—rose by over 8 percent. This increase in the volume of money corresponds very closely indeed to the increase in prices. "It is no accident," says the Chicago memorandum, "that these figures are so nearly of the same magnitude. This is about as clear a case of purely monetary inflation as one can find."

Mr. Snyder should tell the country how he proposes to finance effectively the military program if, in competition with it, he continues to insist on having inflationary manufactured money pumped into the civilian economy through private channels, through local governments, and through the agencies of the Federal Government, of which, according to Mr. Russell Leffingwell, there are now about 100 engaged in lending and giving and spending money.

And while Mr. Snyder is explaining all that it would be a good idea if the Director of Defense Mobilization, Mr. Charles E. Wilson, considered the problem, and perhaps took a hand in the solution. He is vitally interested in the solution. For it is hard to see how he can fail to run into tremendous trouble if underneath the artificial price and wage structure he is trying to establish there is the destructive force of a repressed but swelling monetary inflation.

(By Walter Lippmann)

OFF THE CUFF

Much is at stake in the argument between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve System, and the complicated problem can only be confused and bedeviled if President Truman lets it become distorted into a political quarrel between his friends and his opponents. The controversy is not like an election or like a football game which can be settled and disposed of when one side has won and the other has lost. For the management of our huge Federal debt by the Treasury and the regulation of the supply of money and credit by the Federal Reserve will have to be carried on continuously and cooperatively.

The two agencies of Government are going to have to agree on a common policy. Neither can afford to win in the sense that it knocks out the other and then drags it along triumphantly behind it.

The crux of the present controversy is whether they are to work together with some flexibility, or whether the Treasury is to dominate the Federal Reserve System in order to maintain a rigid pattern of interest rates. My own inquiries have convinced me that if the issue of flexibility were left to those who best understand it in the two agencies, it would not be a fighting issue at all, and that the problem could be settled by practical operations in the money market, and without resounding declarations.

The rigid dogmatism which now appears to be the Treasury policy certainly does an injustice to its good sense and competence. And the impression which has got abroad is, of course, absurd that the Federal Reserve System is not concerned about the Federal debt and is advocating a policy of let her rip. "We are suffering," says a very highly qualified observer who wrote to me the other day, "the consequences of having had three exceptionally stubborn Secretaries of the Treasury in succession during the past 10 years." Now that it is essential to put an end to the inflation of Federal Reserve credit, we have to deal not only with the problem itself, which is a delicate one, but with politicians who have become so addicted to inflation that they tremble at the idea of being deprived of it.

Before long Mr. Truman will find that the question is not so simple as he thought it was when he summoned the Federal Reserve Board and the presidents of five Federal Reserve banks to the White House. He will find that even if he were able to force the Federal Reserve to manufacture as much inflationary money as the Treasury's rigid interest rate required the controversy would break out again elsewhere.

It would break out because to control prices and wages and to obtain production uninterrupted by strikes will prove to be impossible if the pressure of inflationary credit is not reduced. It is a reasonable certainty that if the Federal Reserve Board were to knuckle under today, within a short time Mr. Wilson and Mr. Johnston would have to revive the argument.

When the order for a general price freeze was issued on January 26 Mr. DiSalle issued a statement which had been approved by Mr. Eric Johnston, the Administrator of the Economic Stabilization Agency. It is the statement of men who find themselves forced to do something which they don't at all like to do. The statement says that though the general price control has become necessary as an emergency measure, Mr. Johnston and the men responsible with him have no illusions: "The effect of price control is not to eliminate inflation but to suppress it * * * major reliance must be placed upon vigorous taxation and a strong credit policy. To the extent that we succeed in reducing the inflationary pressure by these means we make the task of price control that much easier."

As a matter of fact, this is almost certainly an understatement. Price control will not work at all if the inflationary pressure continues to accumulate. It will produce an orgy of corruption and black markets, of injustice and discontent. In order to make price control work well, that is to say with reasonable honesty and fairness, it would be necessary not only to stop adding to the inflation but to find ways of accomplishing a measure of disinflation.

We shall have to come to that. At least for the emergency period of the mobilization we shall have to resort to emergency methods to disinflate, measures beyond any contemplated by the Federal Reserve Board or really within the proper use of its powers. In one way or another the disinflation will have to be brought about by a considerable reduction in Federal, State, and local public expenditure of civilian uses, by greater private and corporate savings, and almost certainly also by scrutinizing more critically than it is now the fashion to do the content of some of the military programs. We should not naively assume that the survival of western civilization depends upon treating every order from the quartermaster, and every order for four-door sedans, as sacrosanct.

Perhaps the most important thing to be noted about the President's intervention in this business is that he thought he could settle it personally in a few minutes' talk. That is one of Mr. Truman's weaknesses. In this case he didn't settle the controversy but he aggravated it. Thus, though he was lining up the Federal Reserve System behind the Treasury, he did not even take the precaution of having the Treasury represented at the meeting. This prevented him from hearing the issue argued by men competent to discuss it. It left him supposing that he himself could argue the Treasury's case. In fact he didn't argue it and he couldn't argue it. The Federal Reserve men listened to him and did not argue with him because they were too polite to argue with the President of the United States on a subject about which the President obviously was not understanding the question.

It would be ever so much better if Mr. Truman would recognize the difficulties and the complexities of a problem like this, and would realize that no one would think it a reflection on the President of the United States if he himself does not know the answers off the cuff. Then he would do what most Presidents before him would have done. He would bring together those most responsible and best informed—in this case the representatives of the Treasury, of the Federal Reserve System, and the civilian mobilizers, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Johnston, and Mr. DiSalle—and he would press them to work out agreements. He would reserve his own influence for use against anyone who in the discussion showed himself to be at once badly informed and highly opinionated.

FIGHTING FIRE WITH GASOLINE

(By Henry Hazlitt)

How preposterous can the situation get? The administration starts the inflationary fire, fights it by pouring on more gasoline, and then talks as if it were completely mysterious in origin. Or it hints that the fire was started by business, by the speculators, the hoarders, the profiteers, or by the buying public. And it acts on this assumption when it insists on the completely false remedy of price control, which puts the economy in a straitjacket of prohibitions, allocations, rationing, licenses, and subsidies, unbalances and disrupts production, creating artificial shortages. All this is called total mobilization.

Take the Secretary of the Treasury, John W. Snyder. He is personally a mild-mannered, quiet, unassuming, amiable, loyal, and honorable man who thinks of himself as a conservative. He would be shocked beyond measure to learn that he is more responsible than any other single man for the existing inflation in this country and the almost universal fear of further inflation. And he has earned this No. 1 position not only by his past record but by his extraordinary announcement on January 18 that the long-term rate for marketable Federal securities must be held at 2½ percent. He might just as well have announced outright that he is determined to have more inflation.

Mr. Snyder's attitude stems, of course, not from any desire for inflation, but from a tragic lack of understanding of economic cause and effect. Inflation, always and everywhere, has one basic cause—an increase in the supply of money and bank credit. At the end of 1939, demand deposits and currency outside of banks totaled $36,000,000,000. At the end of May of 1950 this total had reached $109,000,000,000. At the end of December of 1950 it had reached $117,000,000,000. This is not merely the cause of inflation; this is the inflation. The increase in commodity prices is merely a consequence.

And the principal cause in turn of this increase in money and bank credit has been the artificially low interest rates maintained by the Treasury. This cheap money policy has not merely swollen the volume of private borrowing; it could be maintained—in connection with the policy of pegging Government bonds above par—only by encouraging the member banks to load up with Government bonds and by forcing the Federal Reserve banks to buy as many of those bonds as is necessary to maintain the predetermined rate. They bought these bonds by creating deposits or printing money.

All this is now an old story among monetary economists and bankers. But Mr. Snyder has never understood it. He can see the problem only from the immediate short-run interest of the Treasury—to pay as low an interest rate as possible. "Any increase in the 2½-percent rate," he says "would seriously upset the existing security markets."

Any increase in prevailing interest rates would of course mean a lower price for present outstanding bonds. But Mr. Snyder refuses to see that the only alternative to accepting this comparatively mild consequence is an uncontrollable inflation. In the face of overwhelming economic opinion and evidence to the contrary, Mr. Snyder persists in declaring that a cheap money policy and inflation have nothing to do with each other.

If Mr. Snyder stood alone in this appalling blindness the situation would not be so grave. But he is supported in administration circles by a conspiracy of silence. Within the Federal Reserve System there is some real understanding of the situation; but—with a few honorable exceptions like Allan Sproul, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York—there is precious little courage. Mr. Snyder's statement clearly implies that Chairman McCabe of the Federal Reserve Board acquiesces in the policy of maintaining the inflationary 2½ percent interest rate. In lieu of any genuinely effective over-all action, the Board on January 16 announced the token gesture of increasing required stock margins from 50 to 75 percent. Meanwhile, an ominously growing bureau prepares to cure inflation with the colossal hoax of price control.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I wish to read into the RECORD from the letter by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], in order to stress the particular point involved, as well as some other points. The letter was addressed by the junior Senator from Ohio to Governor Vardaman. I read:

The concluding paragraph of your statement is one of the most amazing ever uttered by a public official in recent years. You say, "The question of statutory prerogatives * * * should be subordinated to the all-important necessity of supporting the Government and the Presidency in this national emergency." The meaning of this euphemism is that the laws passed by Congress should be disregarded whenever the President feels that the national emergency so requires. I am unalterably opposed to that sort of totalitarian philosophy either in war in in peace.

You also say in the final paragraph of your statement that you "unhesitantly waive any theoretical statutory authority and prerogatives in order to support the Government and the Presidency at this time." First, I would like to point out that the laws of the United States are not theoretical for 150,000,000 American people. They must obey them or go to jail. By what right do you presume to waive statutory authority in violation of your oath of office?

Finally, I invite your attention to the fact that the Federal Reserve System is accountable to the Congress and not to the Presidency as you suggest. Congress has not charged the Board with the duty of supporting the price of Government securities, but rather the duty of supporting the value of the dollar.

Until such time as the duties of the Board may be changed by act of Congress, I trust that you will see the impropriety of your suggested waiver of statutory authority and prerogatives.

REPLY TO THE PRESIDENT'S CHALLENGE TO CUT THE BUDGET

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, last Thursday the President of the United States held a press conference during the course of which a reporter noted that some Members of the Congress had expressed their determination to squeeze the water out of the budget. Newspaper reports quote Mr. Truman's reply to the effect that, "they said they were going to do that last year, and ended by adding a billion or so, and then asked the President to do the cutting." The President is further reported as saying he is not going to do it for them this year, that it is a good budget and a tight budget, and he dares the Congress to do anything about it.

Mr. President, I am not sure that it is my sole responsibility, as a minority Member of the Senate, to attempt to set the RECORD straight so far as Congress is concerned. The President's statement certainly is a challenge to the majority of this body, as well as to the minority, because in the handling of the budget last year we did function properly. I wish to state that the kindest thing the Senator from New Hampshire can say about the President's remarks—and the Senator from New Hampshire has a kindly and warm feeling for the President, personally—is that either Mr. Truman was misinformed, or he was attempting to be facetious. He has repeatedly advised the press and other groups that he is an expert on the budget—that he has been preparing budgets for years and knows all about them.

We can only hope, Mr. President, that President Truman knows more about the budget which he submitted on January 15 of this year than he knew about the budget he submitted last year.

Mr. President, I wish to make it perfectly clear where I stand on this matter. I wish to take exception to the President's statement that the Congress added a billion or so and then asked the President to do the cutting. I have in my hand a copy of the appropriations estimates for 1950–51, with all the actual budget estimates which were requested by the President and by the Bureau of the Budget for consideration by the Congress.

I have the record here, in its official form. If it is available to me, certainly it is available to the President and to every other Senator, so what I am saying I am taking from the official record. Senators can examine it. There can be no question about it.

Let us discuss, first, the general appropriations bill for 1951. The estimates considered by the House were $30,300,000,000. The House cut this figure to $29,100,000,000. By the time the budget estimates reached the Senate, the figure had grown to $35,500,000,000. As finally enacted, the appropriations bill had been reduced to $33,900,000,000, a reduction of more than $2,000,000,000.

I wish next to call attention, Mr. President, to some facts concerning the second supplemental appropriations bill. The estimates considered by the House totaled $18,000,000,000. The House reduced this figure to $17,800,000,000. By the time the estimates had reached the Senate the figure had grown, as a result of increased estimates from the President, to $19,900,000,000, and the supplemental bill as finally passed by the Congress remained at that figure—$19,900,000,000.

It can readily be seen from these facts that the statement which President Truman made the other day to the effect that Congress had added a billion or so simply does not make sense.

Taken together there are some interesting figures regarding the total appropriations for the fiscal year 1951. The estimates considered by the House were $66,700,000,000. The House reduced this figure to $65,000,000,000. By the time the estimates had reached the Senate, the President and the Bureau of the Budget had submitted additional estimates to bring the figure up to $74,200,000,000. When passed by the Congress this figure had been reduced to $72,300,000,000.

The Senate will recall that the so-called Bridges-Byrd amendment, which had the support of the overwheling majority of this body, was adopted by a vote of 55 to 31. The over-all effect of that amendment was to reduce the appropriations bill by nearly a billion dollars and as amended by the Senate it provided for an additional cut of $550,000, a very substantial amount. The Congress was perfectly clear at this point. It stated where the cuts were to be made and by whom they were to be made. However, when the appropriations bill was sent to conference, the administration leaders brought sufficient pressure to bear to change the intent of the Bridges-Byrd amendment and directed that the President and the Bureau of the Budget make these reductions, in the sum of $550,000,000, wherever they see fit.

It is very interesting in view of these facts, Mr. President, that President Truman claims the Congress added a billion dollars or more, and he did the cutting. The fact of the matter is that he did the adding on and the Congress did the cutting. The facts are here. They speak for themselves. It was the Congress and not the President which reduced the final estimates submitted by the President and the Bureau of the Budget from $74,000,000,000 to $72,000,000,000.

The President, Members of Congress, and everyone else should examine the official record in this regard, which speaks for itself.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not a fact that the President sent to Congress supplementary estimates and budgets, so that he increased the budget, rather than the Congress increasing the budget over and beyond his estimate?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. So, the Congress did not appropriate unbudgeted items over and above the amount of the budget estimates both as contained in the original and in supplemental budgets.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from Michigan is absolutely correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the Senator feel that it is up to the whole Congress, representing the people as it does, to accept the challenge issued by the President, by looking into his budget and examining it and actually cutting down some of the unnecessary expenditures provided in it? Does not the Senator agree that it becomes the duty not only of the minority in the Senate, for whom I can speak in the Senate, but of the majority in the Senate, in fact of the whole Senate, to scrutinize every item and accept the challenge issued by the President in relation to the cutting of the budget?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that when I speak here today I am speaking not only as a minority Member of this body, but I feel I am speaking for this body. Someone should speak for the great numbers on the majority side who contributed to the writing of the record to which I have referred. It is a good record. It is not so good a record as I wish had been made, but it is a good record that was written. The duty certainly falls on the shoulders of someone to stand on the floor of the Senate and correct the President's statement issued to the country in which he said that the Congress had added a billion dollars to the appropriations, whereas the Congress had actually cut $2,000,000,000 from the budget, plus the amount represented by the Bridges-Byrd amendment which, as proposed, would have cut nearly $1,000,000,000 more, but which, when it finally went to conference, resulted in cutting $550,000,000 more.

So the Congress, instead of adding a billion dollars, as the President said, cut directly $2,000,000,000, plus the $550,000,000 which was cut in conference. The Congress saved $2,500,000,000, which, in the opinion of some individuals may not amount to much, but certainly it means a considerable amount to the heavily taxed people of the country.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not fair to say that the President, by his statement, has endeavored to lead the public to believe that the Congress is responsible for the appropriations and the size of the budget and, over and above the President's request, increased the budget by approximately $1,000,000,000? The Senator from New Hampshire has now pointed out that that is not a fact. He has pointed out that the President actually demanded a certain amount of funds, and that the Congress gave him even less than he demanded, instead of more than he demanded.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes; the Congress appropriated $2,000,000,000 less than the President demanded, and, in addition, as a result of the action taken in the final conference Congress wrote in a cut of $550,000,000, in lieu of the amount of cut proposed by the Bridges-Byrd amendment, which resulted in a total reduction of more than $2,500,000,000 which the Congress either made directly or provided for by law.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not also a fact that, in spite of the reduction provided in the Bridges-Byrd amendment, an amendment which the Senator from Michigan joined in supporting, in spite of the specific provision of law passed by the Congress as a result of that amendment, as it was changed in the final conference, there have come back into the present budget items which were cut out by the provision of the law passed last year?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes. The last supplemental bill contained a very large number of such items. There is practically a continual story in that connection, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to add that I shall join other Members of the Senate, in accepting the challenge of the President to cut the present budget.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, a great many taxpayers may raise the question as to why these estimates considered by the Senate are so much higher than those considered and passed by the House. That question has a very simple answer. Anyone who has worked on the Appropriations Committee as I have over a period of a decade and a half knows that there is an almost constant influx of additional requests for appropriations from the time the budget is submitted until it is finally passed. A classic example of this is to be found in last year's budget. The general appropriations estimates submitted to the House did not include any requests for a foreign-aid bill. Between the time the House was given the estimates and the time the Senate considered them, the President had submitted a foreign-aid bill calling for $4,900,000,000.

Mr. President, using the same kind of logic the President used in his press conference on Thursday of last week he should, in order to have been consistent, have accused the Congress of adding the $4,800,000,000 to the budget for foreign aid.

I should like to make it perfectly clear that these budget estimates are recommendations of the President and the Bureau of the Budget, which is under his direction, and a creature of the Executive.

The same thing is happening again this year. On January 15, the President submitted his budget to the Congress. Only last week the President sent to the Congress a request for a small item, for $3,125,000 to be added to one item alone. It should be clearly understood that it is the President and not the Congress who is asking for the increase in this item.

Mr. President, as the ranking Republican member on the Senate Appropriations Committee, I ask that the American people be given the facts. If the President insists upon constantly increasing his request after the original budget estimates are made, let him tell the American people that he is the one who is adding to their tax load and not the Congress.

Many of us want to accept the President's challenge to cut the budget this year. Most of the Republican Members of this body, with whom I have talked, feel as I do, and I know that some members of the President's own party, will join in an effort to reduce the cost of government.

It would be extremely helpful if the Congress could count on the President's cooperation in this effort. Of course, if we cannot have that cooperation then we will have to do it without his cooperation.

I want to serve notice of our intention to scrutinize very closely every request in this budget. We must reduce to a minimum every nondefense expenditure. We must likewise examine carefully every request for money for the Defense Establishment, to see that a dollar's worth of defense is received for every dollar spent. I think that is a very logical thing for us to do.

Mr. President, I believe that in these days of sacrifices by the American people, we will have the character, the determination, and the courage to accept the President's challenge. The people elected us to watch out for their interests, and it is up to us to meet our responsibilities.

The Senator from New Hampshire, for one, is convinced that if we are to draft American boys, if American boys are to die on the foreign battlefields, if we are to tax American families more than they have ever been taxed before, if we are to call for sacrifices and for the acceptance of a lower standard of living, then we have the right and the duty to demand that the administration likewise make some sacrifices.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Will the Senator tell the Senate what proportion of the budget is not related to military expenses? By "military expenses" I mean, of course, expenses for preparation for the national defense now and the cost of the veterans' care and the interest on the national debt. What percentage of the total budget is involved in military expenditures?

Mr. BRIDGES. Something over two-thirds.

Mr. McMAHON. As a matter of fact, it is approximately 74 percent, is it not?

Mr. BRIDGES. Let us bear in mind that the Senator from Connecticut may not be aware of the fact that when the President submitted his budget estimates the other day, and when they came to the Congress in January, for the first time the President failed to accompany them with justifications, except for a small part of the total amount he requested. So, thus far, the Congress—as the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], could tell the Senator as well as I could—is not able to state the details; we have only the broad figures.

However, as the Senator is aware, roughly speaking, we are talking about an expenditures budget, on the one hand, and an appropriations budget, on the other. The expenditures budget will approximate the size I have stated, and percentagewise may be less than the appropriations budget to which the Senator from Connecticut is referring. The difference is a small percentage figure, which I would not attempt to give from memory. However, the figure stated by the Senator from Connecticut is in the general field of being correct.

Mr. McMAHON. I am glad to know that, because when we approach the budget question, I think all of us realize that the opportunity to achieve economy in Government is somewhat limited to us by the nature of the expenditures we have had to make and those we shall have to make for the national defense and security. I think that point cannot be emphasized too strongly.

I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that during the last session I voted consistently for what I thought were reasonable cuts in the appropriations for the executive departments. I refused to vote to apply for a conservator and to ask the President to do something the Senate refused to do. I voted against that, and I shall continue to vote against it, because if I cannot discharge my own responsibility, I am not going to ask the President to discharge it for me. So I intend to pursue the policy which I followed during the last session.

On the other hand, let us not deceive the American people about the scope within which we can operate in connection with the budget. When some talk about cutting $6,000,000,000 from the civilian expenditures budget, it simply cannot be done, and it is merely a piece of fakery to say that it can be done.

I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for yielding to me.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me, to permit me to make a statement?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I have said that this budget could be cut by from $5,000,000,000 to $6,000,000,000. I think it is an absurdity to assert that the budget cannot be cut by 10 percent straight through, without doing any serious harm or injury to the national defense program.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I would not have the Senator from Georgia misunderstand me at all. As I understand, the Senator contemplates a cut right straight through the budget on the military expenditures.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not say that. I said that the budget could be cut by 10 percent, and even then we would not get the waste out of the military side of the budget.

However, I rose to point out that I am not guilty of any fakery, nor am I guilty of any attempt to deceive the American people, when I say that the budget can be cut by between $5,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000, without injury to the national defense.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me, so that I may answer the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I did not mean to imply that the Senator from Georgia was guilty of fakery. What I said was that we could not take $6,000,000,000 from the civilian expenditures, as opposed to the military expenditures, of our Government; and an attempt to say that that could be done in my opinion is fakery.

Now the Senator from Georgia says that the $6,000,000,000 cut can be achieved over the entire range of the budget. That is a subject upon which I would not comment at this time because I have not made a study of the military expenditures and I am not prepared to say that that cannot be done. My impression is that before the end of this year we shall end up by appropriating more money for military defense than is requested in the budget.

I would not want the Senator from Georgia to think I applied the statement of "fakery" to him, because he is talking about an over-all cut, a cut out of the entire budget, which he thinks is possible, whereas I am talking about a cut of $6,000,000,000, which I have seen advertised, although not by the Senator from Georgia, as being possible to be taken from the civilian side of the budget, as opposed to the military side.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Connecticut, because he has talked about a division of the budget as between the expenditures for military purposes and those for civilian purposes, that, of course, the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and all other Members of Congress wish to appropriate sufficient money so that the security of the United States may be assured. However, when anyone says or attempts to say that the military budget is untouchable, that simply is not so.

Let me give an example, in order to illustrate why I make that statement: When we were sent the last supplemental appropriation bill, requesting additional appropriations for military purposes, naturally the Appropriations Committee wished to move, and move rapidly, in handling that bill. In that connection we did some things which I did not approve of doing. We actually included in that bill some items which were not authorized by law, for the over-all construction program had not then been authorized. Nevertheless, in the interest of the national defense and the national security, the committee deemed it wise to do those things, and the Senate concurred in that action. I am not quarreling as to that.

On the other hand, in connection with the brief examination we made of the military items, one item alone which stood out was for $100,000,000 for relief in Korea. For whom was that relief to be provided? It was in substantial part for the relief of the North Koreans, whom we were fighting, and who were killing American boys day by day; and included in that amount were items for such things as rebuilding municipal electric-light systems or rebuilding various building projects in North Korea. We even found included in that total an item for the purchase of diapers for North Korean Communist children. Those were actual items in that budget request.

So, Mr. President, when we find such items as that included in a military budget, I say it is not an untouchable budget; and therefore we can well survey the entire situation. I have cited that case only as an example. I believe, therefore, that the budget this year should have the personal attention of every Senator.

Recently I noted an item in the press showing that executive departments which, by the greatest stretch of the imagination, have nothing to do with national defense, were asking for increased personnel, in commission after commission, department after department. That certainly is not moving in the right direction, but in the wrong direction. I note also that many agencies of Government are coming forward saying, "We must do certain things because of the war effort," when as a matter of fact their proposals were not for the war effort at all. Those are matters which must be scrutinized.

No one is perfect; I realize that; but the Senate this year is faced with the likelihood that taxes will go to their highest level, at a time when American boys are being killed, and when other American boys are being drafted. With the situation throughout the world what it is, and when we are trying to help our friends in other countries build up and provide for collective security, I think it is up to us to perform a real job in keeping down appropriations.

I realize what the President has said about this being a tight budget. I have not studied it as fully as I should like to do, though I feel confident that I have given it as much study as anyone else in the Congress, and perhaps as much as anyone in the country, aside from the Bureau of the Budget. I contend that the budget is demonstrably as full of water as a field of melting snow. I think we can squeeze a great deal out of the budget. But, Mr. President, there must be a will to do it. The facts must be known to the American people, and there must be a will on the part of this body to do it. We cannot merely stand by and scoff at every attempt and at every serious-minded effort to cut the budget.

To cut some of the nondefense items of the budget is not going to harm anyone. Certainly anyone who gives more than a casual glance at the defense items knows we can cut some of the fat from the unnecessary things, such as Korean relief, and from certain of the military items which have been submitted. I hope that when the record of this Congress is written, it will demonstrate that we have done our work well—that several billions should be cut from the budget—and at least that we equal or better our last year's record, when we cut something over $2,000,000,000 from the budget by direct action on the part of the Congress, and at the same time included a directive to the extent of an additional reduction of $550,000,000.

GOVERNOR DRISCOLL AND THE FEDERAL BUDGET

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, in the Newark News of yesterday, Sunday, February 11, 1951, there appeared an article written by William R. Clark, one of the leading news writers in the State of New Jersey. The article is captioned Political Foreground and in it Mr. Clark emphasizes the fact that Governor Driscoll, fresh from the State budget triumph we have just had in New Jersey, now is ready, along with the Governors of the other States, to take on another great fight, namely, to try to find a solution of the excessive Federal budget. This article is most apropos, in view of the remarks made earlier today by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the body of the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of New Jersey in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICAL FOREGROUND—FRESH FROM STATE BUDGET TRIUMPH, DRISCOLL WOULD TRY HAND AT FEDERAL FIGURES

(By William R. Clark)

Having won his bout with a middleweight budget, Governor Driscoll is tempted to accept a challenge for a go with a real heavyweight. He has been reading about the Federal budget, which weighed in at $71,000,000,000, and of President Truman's open invitation to cut it down to size, if possible.

While Mr. Truman's defi was addressed specifically to the Congress, Mr. Driscoll thinks maybe this shouldn't be a private fight. He is confident that if the Congress couldn't bring the President's budget down his brother Governors could. For one thing, he thinks they've had more training and, of necessity, stiffer budget work-outs than either Congress or the administration. Even though they operate on a limited scale relatively, Governors have faced no such fiscal set-ups as Washington. Their revenues come harder and all have been victims of inflation and Federal tax encroachments.

From a wealth of experience, Mr. Driscoll is ready to concede that a Governor's recommendations don't mean any more in Washington, say, than a price freeze that isn't. He knows about the impact of rearmament on Federal costs, and on State costs, too, for that matter; and that everything, especially taxes, is on a bigger scale nationally. But he also knows that budgets and champions grow fat on soft living, and he's convinced that financially the country could do much worse than give a Governors' committee a crack at trimming Federal overhead.

INFLATIONARY DRIFT

Since most Governors have completed or are in process of completing State budgets, they are acutely aware at this time of the fiscal soft spots of the Federal Government and what the inflationary drift has done to State resources. Mr. Driscoll's prize exhibit in this direction is the State turnpike. By the time this project completes its 118-mile journey next November from the George Washington Bridge to Deepwater it will have picked up en route $30,000,000 in increased costs. Original estimates, it seems, did not take into account the spectacular flight of materials and allied construction costs.

In the 1949 election, the voters ratified a bond issue of $25,000,000 for a State hospital construction program. At the then market, the Governor and department of institutions and agencies expected the $25,000,000 to provide buildings and facilities sufficient to care adequately for the State's 25,000 patients and to meet reasonable increases in institutional population. Today's prices will sheer off one whole wing of the new South Jersey Hospital.

Within a few months, and due to unchecked and nonscheduled price flights, Mr. Driscoll finds $500,000 added to the fuel and grocery bills of these same 21 mental, correctional and specialized institutions. The Governor is getting figures from the State government council on what fuel and food increases, for one thing, have done to budgets in other States.

Mr. Driscoll hopes Eric Johnston, the ESA optimist, knows what he is talking about when he estimates that, under the thawing price freeze, costs will level off by midsummer. That, he thinks, will be fine, provided State budgets don't melt first.

UNWILLING TO WAIT

But the Governor notes that pressure is already being exerted at vulnerable spots for a cost-of-living increase for State employees. For some strange reason, they seem unwilling to wait, with Mr. Johnston's easy equableness, for the promised price altitude to be reached.

The State's payroll already runs to $49,550,000 a year. That's an increase of $2,130,000 over 1950, and provides only for normal salary increments due employees under civil service ratings. This upgrading, for which Mr. Driscoll already has set aside sufficient funds, is not to be confused with cost-of-living raises. When you get into that department you're in the heavy money zone—somewhere between $10,000,000 and $16,000,000, depending upon which of several estimates are consulted.

Not all of Mr. Driscoll's inflationary exhibits are as aggravated as the turnpike and institutions items, or as the salary problem could be. They are the largest, and the ones over which he has no control.

In other controllable categories, the Governor's recommendations are in the bare bones class. He believes that, in spite of Mr. Truman's confidence, some of the same hard economics could be introduced into the Federal budget. Anyhow, Mr. Driscoll thinks it would be fun to try.

THE FOOD CRISIS IN INDIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 56)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(For the President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives, pp. 1243–1244.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and also on behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], I desire to express our gratification that the President has supported our proposal for emergency aid to India and has sent a message to Congress urging prompt consideration of a bill to implement it. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on next Thursday we plan to introduce a bill providing for emergency aid to alleviate the famine situation in India and we hope that there will be many Senators on both sides of the aisle who will join us on this bill. A similar bill will be introduced in the House at the same time by a bipartisan group of Representatives.

We have attempted to get the best information obtainable on the exact situation in India, to ascertain what foods are available, and how much India must have in order to avert the very critical famine. We hope to have our measure ready to circulate among interested Senators tomorrow and to introduce in the Senate next Thursday.

I may say that the proposal for aid to India originated in the Congress as a bipartisan movement. We have been in touch with the State Department, which has given us valuable assistance in providing us with information on the situation in India, but we feel it is best for this proposal to come from the Congress as an indication of the wishes of the people of the United States who, from the information we are getting by way of letters, telegrams, and so forth, are eager that something be done to provide relief. We have therefore tried to apply ourselves to all the problems involved, and to obtain the assistance of the representatives of the Department of State, the Department of Agriculture, ECA, and other interested departments and agencies, to ascertain exactly what can be done. A very careful study has been made, and of course, in the hearings, testimony will be forthcoming to show what has been discovered.

For the information of the Senate, I might add that on January 30, a bipartisan group in both the Senate and the House addressed a communication to the President on this subject. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read it, but I ask unanimous consent that, at this point in my remarks, the communication to the President, together with the names of the signers from both the Senate and the House, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1951.

The PRESIDENT,
White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Over 3 years ago the people of India entered a new era as a free and independent member of the family of nations. We, as Members of Congress, have been aware of the common devotion of the American people and the people of India to the ideals of human liberty.

This year India is faced with an emergency food shortage and has asked the United States for help. We have been discussing this situation among ourselves and with interested citizen groups, and have come to the conclusion that a favorable response by the United States to this Indian request would be in harmony with the interests and traditional policy of the United States and would furnish a concrete demonstration of the friendship and good will existing between our people and theirs.

A series of misfortunes including earthquakes, floods, droughts, and locusts has cut India's grain production this year 6,000,000 tons below her minimum requirements. It is our understanding that, in an effort to make up this shortage, the Indian Government has arranged to purchase some 4,000,000 tons from Canada, Australia, Argentina, and the United States. These emergency purchases have drastically reduced India's foreign exchange reserves, so that she is reported to be unable to purchase the remaining 2,000,000 tons needed to prevent widespread famine. For this remaining deficit India has appealed to the United States for emergency aid, and we understand the United States is in a position to meet that request.

To that end we are considering the introduction of legislation under which Congress would authorize the necessary emergency assistance. Unless we act promptly, many hundreds of thousands of people in India face starvation.

It is our hope that we may have an early opportunity to discuss this question with you in detail. In our view, the need to prevent starvation is entirely separate from all political considerations. It is our further view that a response to that need should not imply any commitment on the part of the United States beyond the present emergency food situation. We do not want our desire to help the suffering people of India within the reasonable limits of our capacities to be regarded as in any sense lessening our opposition to the apparent views of the Government of India with respect to the Chinese Communist aggression in Korea. On the other hand, our firm opposition to this apparent position of the Government of India on that issue does not lessen in the least our desire to help relieve the acute food shortage in India.

As a bipartisan group, therefore, we hope we may have your support for our proposal and that we may coordinate our efforts with those of the executive branch. We look forward to hearing from you at your early convenience.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM BENTON, PAUL H. DOUGLAS, RALPH E. FLANDERS, ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, IRVING M. IVES, HERBERT H. LEHMAN, WARREN G. MAGNUSON, WAYNE L. MORSE, JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, JAMES E. MURRAY, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, H. ALEXANDER SMITH, CHARLES W. TOBEY, United States Senators; FRANCES P. BOLTON, THURMOND CHATHAM, JAMES G. FULTON, CHRISTIAN A. HERTER, JACOB K. JAVITS, WALTER H. JUDD, EDNA F. KELLY, MIKE MANSFIELD, THOMAS E. MORGAN, ABRAHAM A. RIBICOFF, Members of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Subsequent to the sending of that letter, the President of the United States invited representatives of the signers to confer with him. We had a very extended conference with the President and certain of his advisers as to the practicability of our proposal. The President subsequently took the matter up, as we know from the press, with former President Hoover, who came to Washington specifically for the purpose of discussing the question with the President. Mr. Hoover, on leaving, expressed his approval of an emergency assistance program and called attention to certain problems concerning it which will be covered by our hearings. The President subsequently met with ranking leaders of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to discuss the proposal.

It is my purpose, as I said in my opening remarks, on behalf of myself and of the Senators whom I have named, and on behalf also of any other Senators who may wish to joint with us in this effort to introduce an appropriate bill on Thursday next. We are inviting all who desire to cooperate to join with us in sponsoring that bill, which will be promptly referred to the respective committees of the House and Senate for hearings. I believe that the program can be developed in a prompt and orderly manner, in accordance with this procedure.

In conclusion, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an editorial entitled "Mr. Hoover Intervenes," published in the New York Times of February 9, and an editorial entitled "Wheat for India," published in the New York Herald Tribune of the same date. These editorials indicate the popular support that has been developed on this important subject.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of February 9, 1951]

MR. HOOVER INTERVENES

Former President Herbert Hoover's timely intervention seems to have quieted some Members of Congress who held that starving people whose governments differ with our Government should be permitted to go on starving. As a result some 120,000,000 persons in India who have been living on a grain allowance of 9 ounces a day, perhaps 40 percent of what they need, can hope to benefit by 2,000,000 tons of American wheat. We don't believe anybody on Capitol Hill wanted those people to starve or to die of the diseases malnutrition brings. But some did seem to hold that it was up to Mr. Nehru to prevent this catastrophe by chiming in on the United States policy toward Communist China. There is no connection between the two facts: Mr. Nehru is, we believe, wrong; his people need the grain we can easily send and should have it.

Mr. Hoover is, as everybody knows, a humanitarian with a practical bent. He has had long and honorable experience in relief work; he is well aware that grain moves by rail and by water and that no amount of good will can offset a shortage of planning. He did not mention bushels or dollars after seeing the President on Wednesday. He did not, however, seem to see insurmountable difficulties in finding 1,800,000 to 2,000,000 bushels of wheat India must have or the ships to carry something like 220 shiploads that the amount asked will make.

India asked for this food on December 16, offering to assume a long-term debt to pay for it. At best 2 months from that date will have gone by before the shipment is authorized, and this is too bad. Perhaps it will help a little if we give this grain free—and give it in the spirit of a remark made by Senator HUMPHREY, of Minnesota: "This is people to people, not government to government."

WHEAT FOR INDIA

President Truman has done well in securing Mr. Hoover's help in planning aid for the starving peoples of India; Mr. Hoover, in turn, has responded with the alacrity and magnanimity that was to be expected of him. "This is not in the category of politics but in the category of Christianity," he said; and the view will be echoed, we believe, by the overwhelming majority of Americans. It is an impressive thing that this wise and experienced public servant, having contributed to his country and to the world more than is asked of many men in a generation, should take up this fresh assignment with an unrelaxing sense of duty and with something close to youthful enthusiasm. A democracy is rich in proportion as it contains proven men ready to respond to any call; and Mr. Hoover, throughout his long career, has been one of those who have never failed where service was asked of them.

The case for sending grain to India is clear. A series of natural catastrophes has struck at the food supplies of the new-born nation. Floods, droughts, earthquakes, and visitations of locusts have conspired to render life uncertain for millions. Some 6,000,000 tons of grains will have to be imported this year if a minimum standard of diet is to be maintained; of these two-thirds have already been provided for, and a request to the United States has been solemnly made for the additional 2,000,000. Our Government possesses the grain; transportation can be arranged; the terms on which it will be sent—whether as a grant or as a long-term loan—can be worked out. The important thing is that the human cause not be lost sight of, and that action be taken before it is too late.

There has, unfortunately, been a disposition to delay, partly as a result of the divergences on international policy between India and ourselves. It is inconceivable, however, that such considerations should weigh significantly in America's decision. The humane tradition of our country is one of its glories; and it is not now, when we step forth to take our full role on the world stage, that narrow motives or unworthy second thoughts should control us. Mr. Hoover has in the past been credited with saving millions of lives through the administration of relief regardless of political affiliation; will he find that some petty calculations or pressures stand even temporarily in the way of saving life in a nation that, despite superficial differences, is one with us in its love of freedom? In the Congress a bipartisan movement to assure relief for India is on foot; and this, combined with effective Executive leadership, will certainly carry the day. Let us only hope that this good victory will be assured while the day is yet young.

Mr. FLANDERS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield for not more than 1 minute?

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New York for 1 minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Vermont may yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I have listened to the message of the President with great interest and sympathy. I wish to say that I fully approve and shall strongly support the program which is outlined in the message. I shall deem it a great pleasure and a source of pride to join with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and I hope, with many other Senators, in introducing the necessary bill to implement the recommendations of the President. I very sincerely hope that such proposed legislation will receive early and favorable consideration by the Members of the Senate.

Finally, Mr. President, I wish to say that I fully associate myself with the statements which were made a few moments ago by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a very brief statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Minnesota may proceed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want to express my appreciation, my gratitude, and congratulations to the President of the United States for his message to the Congress urging legislative action in support of the request of the Government of India for 2,000,000 tons of grain. The Members of the Congress know this has been a concern of mine ever since I became a Member of the Senate in the Eighty-first Congress. It was my belief then and remains my belief today that the future of Asia will depend to a large extent on the destiny of India and its people.

The people of India are a freedom-loving people who achieved independence in a manner similar to the way the United States achieved independence 175 years ago. They are imbued with the concept of human dignity. Their leaders and their scholars have been weaned on the inspiration of Thomas Payne, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Franklin Delano Roosevelt. There is a common bond which unites the people of India and the people of the United States. The future of world peace and the future of our democratic civilization depends on the strengthening of that bond and of that feeling of unity.

The people of India are today in need; they face famine, starvation, and disease. The people of the United States, in the spirit of generosity, humanitarianism, and the Judaic-Christian teachings, are eager and willing to respond to that need.

Mr. President, I am proud and happy to be able to join the Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from New York in urging the enactment of legislation on this important subject. I am proud of the fact that the issue of food for India unites the Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle, as it has united the distinguished former President and leader of the Republican Party, Mr. Hoover, and the leader of the Democratic Party President Truman.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the enactment of such legislation as that proposed would be another demonstration of the warm heart, the warm hand, and the kindly spirit of the American people. If there ever was a time when the people of the world needed to know that our minds are filled with something else besides rearmament and the terrible threat of war, it is at this hour. I am convinced that such a demonstration of the simple, basic, and fundamental goodness, love, and affection would do more to win us friends in the world, and to gladden our own hearts than any other one thing that has been accomplished in a long time by Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "Starvation in India and American Grain," published in the Minneapolis Star of January 29, 1951, and an article entitled "Have You a Dollar To Help India?" written by Paul W. Ward, and published in the Minneapolis Star of the same date.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STARVATION IN INDIA AND AMERICAN GRAIN

Reports from Washington and New Delhi are that India is going to ask America for an extra 2,000,000 tons of food grain as an outright gift, and that if the gift isn't forthcoming 20,000,000 Indians are going to starve during 1951.

The 2,000,000 tons that will be asked are in addition to between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 tons that India is buying with all the exchange it can get its hands on from its own resources or from loans.

About half of the 2,000,000 tons would be wheat, and the balance kafir corn and milo—grains that aren't regarded as foodstuff here, but as feed. That's roughly 33,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 50,000,000 bushels of coarse grain.

The United States will have about 450,000,000 bushels of wheat still on hand when the new crop starts coming in, and the wheat crop prospects look fairly good. So, from a supply standpoint, the country could easily stand shipping 33,000,000 bushels to India.

Last year's crop of grain sorghums was the largest on record, and the country is generally in good shape on stock feed. It can ship the kafir and milo without much interference with the need for increased livestock production.

Giving India this extra 2,000,000 tons won't solve India's long-run problem. There shouldn't be any illusions about that either here or in India. Neither should India be misled into thinking that America could stand repeating such a gift year after year.

But the gift undoubtedly would extend millions of lives another year, and that is not a small thing. The gloomy rule that while there is life there is hope applies.

With all this in view, the Star thinks the gift should be offered. And we hope that current political differences with India won't cause Congress to balk at the necessary appropriations.

HAVE YOU A DOLLAR TO HELP INDIA?—2,000,000 TONS OF UNITED STATES GRAIN SOUGHT AS GIFT

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—How much is 2,000,000 tons of food grain? Roughly, it is 1¾ percent of America's annual grain crop. It would fill about three-quarters of Minneapolis' elevators, which have a greater capacity than those of any city in the world.)

(By Paul W. Ward)

American altruism is about to be put to an even stiffer test in India's behalf than the one it passed successfully last month in Yugoslavia's case.

The test will come when officials get up sufficient courage to pass on to Congress India's request to the United States for 2,000,000 tons of food grains.

It is equivalent to asking each of this country's 150,000,000 residents to put up $1 in aid to India at a time when—largely to pay for an anti-Communist defense program that India shuns—they are being prepared to fork up nearly $500 apiece in Federal taxes.

Executive-branch officials already have satisfied themselves that the grain is available; that India cannot possibly pay cash for it or even acquire it on a loan or credit basis; and that, if anything, it will have to be an outright gift from American taxpayers to the Indian people.

They have not yet satisfied themselves, however, that Congress is in any mood to consider such an outlay, and their doubts on that score have mounted as—

1. Some of the key Democratic as well as Republican Members of Congress continue to lambaste as "complete appeasement" and "abject surrender" the Truman administration's recent apparent acquiescence in an Indian-led move by the UN toward a peace-at-any-price deal with Communist China.

2. Jawaharlal Nehru, India's Prime Minister, reasserted his "new China" thesis at the London Commonwealth conference while continuing to balk at applying to settlement of India's 3-year-old dispute with Pakistan over his homeland of Kashmir the simultaneous-troop-withdrawal formula he prescribes for Korea.

Despite the resulting uncertainties within primarily the State Department, it is virtually certain that inside a month the administration will submit India's request to Congress with an urgent recommendation for its approval on wholly humanitarian grounds.

Considerations pressing them to urge favorable action on Congress are chiefly these:

1. If the aid sought from America is not promptly granted, between 10,000,000 and 20,000,000 Indians will be condemned to death by starvation in the months immediately ahead.

2. If the United States balks at extending aid to a non-Communist government because of its different attitude toward Communist China and related issues, America's foes in Europe as well as Asia will use the fact as proof the Kremlin is right in contending that American humanitarianism is hypocritical and that all aid from this country is given with political strings attached.

3. If Nehru's government should topple under the strains of a starvation economy, its successor would certainly be one reflecting in larger degree the antiforeignism and anti-Americanism of the Indian masses than Nehru's does and thus even more helpful to the Kremlin's Asiatic designs than Nehru's presently may seem to be.

THE TERMS OF AN HONEST PEACE

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, on January 17 last I offered suggestions to the Senate as to how the world conflict in which we are engaged could be more economically and effectively prosecuted, so that it might be brought to an end at a date short of the time of complete prostration for our allies and ourselves. Toward the end of that talk I made brief reference to the possibility of peace by disarmament. I wish now to discuss in more detail a concrete proposal to that end.

Mr. President, we have found ourselves in a very serious position as a result of our foreign problems and the military preparations we are making to meet them. In domestic matters we are facing severe economic strains. Dependence on the military arm to solve our problems requires that we arm to the limit and train soldiers, sailors, and airmen to the limit. While our military budget has been set by the President at nearly $50,000,000,000, no one with mature judgment and experience believes that even that enormous sum is the limit. There is no limit to military demands. By its very nature Armed Force demands of us everything we have. Its desires are as insatiable as in the case of the two daughters of the horse leech to whom Solomon refers in Proverbs. They cry, "Give, give"—and we are giving.

To strain our economy to the utmost is the set purpose of the Politburo. This purpose was foreshadowed by Lenin and is being ably carried out by Stalin. We are dancing to their tune.

It is not only that we are sacrificing to defend our standard of living and the free independence of our economic life. We are sacrificing our freedom itself. We are being forced to shift the American way of life into the pattern of the garrison state. Not only are we shifting we are there now. Yet it is only as the months go by that we will begin to realize all that has happened to us.

It is clear enough that the future of the young men and of many of the young women of this country no longer lies in their own hands. That future is at the command of the military. Schooling will be interrupted, opportunities for beginning employment in life work will be denied. The whole future of the youth of America is clouded with uncertainty as to everything except that the Armed Forces hold their lives and prospects in their hands.

But this power of the garrison state extends beyond persons to institutions. The Armed Forces can determine which ones of the colleges in our country shall survive and which shall perish. With this tremendous drain on the youth of our land only that college which is granted an ROTC contract can continue to perform its functions. Our wealth, our standard of living, the lives of our young people, and our institutions are under the control of the military. We are no longer a free people.

We are doing no better on the foreign than on the domestic front. Our position with relation to Korea is clearly understood by us. It has been clearly expressed in resolutions passed by the House and Senate and has the overwhelming support of the American people. But it is folly for us to ignore the weakening of our position with relation to those who should be our allies.

In very large part the weakening of our allies is due to an unwillingness to face facts. It is due to a strongly ingrained attraction toward appeasement in spite of the fatal results of appeasement hitherto.

But there is more to it than this. To the outsider our position, our policies, and our actions are difficult to distinguish from an old-style contest for power as between ourselves and the Soviet Government. The surface appearances all point this way to those who do not have access to the inner thoughts, desires, and aspirations of the citizens of America. We really are sheep in wolves' clothing. Our neighbors see the wolf's skin but cannot believe there is a sheep in it. Our most plaintive bleating seems to them the sound of a snarling growl. These are the facts of life, and we must face them.

That we are not doing too well in the United Nations goes without saying. Our first impulse is to write that organization off as a failure if its members do not understand our position or sympathize in our attempts to maintain its integrity. Aside from this insistence in maintaining the integrity of purpose of the United Nations which is vital and on which we cannot compromise, the foreign observer must conclude that our attitude and activity are largely summed up in the endeavor to outshout the Soviet delegates. To give our respected Ambassador to the United Nations that thankless task is to weaken our cause and nullify our representation.

Mr. President, it is my conviction that we can move from the negative to the positive in the United Nations. It is my conviction that we can present proposals for peace which will be so simple, so practical, and lead so evidently toward the desired result, that we can appear before the United Nations and before the world as honest, honorable, and practical peace seekers instead of being considered as one of two parties to a contest for world domination. Let us not write off the United Nations. Let us use it.

The proposal is a simple one. It is based on the Baruch plan for the control of atomic energy which was rejected by the Soviet government. It differs fundamentally from the Stockholm Peace Proposals which were aimed at the destruction of the armament in which we are strongest while reserving a full strength to the Soviet government the elements of military power in which that nation is strongest. In essence, the proposal would be to disarm completely in every weapon and to any degree above the few small arms required for maintenance of civil order. The essential, of course, is that the carrying out of this disarmament must be progressive and must be done under the direction and under the inspection of the United Nations itself.

The Baruch plan provided for international control and inspection of a particular form of armament—the atomic bomb. We would propose to extend this to all armament. It requires a treaty signed by all members of the United Nations. This would have to be extended to cover all nations of any importance, whether at present members or not.

As in the Baruch proposals, the treaty would set up a control agency, would provide for complete access by that agency to every nation, would prohibit the manufacture of prohibited arms, would provide for the disposal of those now existing, and would provide sanctions for violations. The peace proposal we would offer would contain these provisions. Most importantly, as will be stated later, the right of access would be the first step in the progressive application of a peace agreement.

In the words of the Baruch report, "In consideration of the problem of violation of the terms of the treaty or convention it should also be borne in mind that a violation might be of so grave a character as to give rise to the inherent right of self-defense recognized in article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations."

This total disarmament plan should likewise provide a schedule for the completion of the transitional process over a period of time step by step in an orderly and agreed sequence leading to the full and effective establishment of international control of armament.

This is the American plan extended to cover all major armament instead of one single element of it.

The first of the series of steps by which disarmament and peace are to be reached will be that of freedom of communication. We must set as the goal the same freedom of communication behind, through, and in front of the iron curtain as existed in Western Europe and the Americas prior to the Second World War. This is not complete freedom, for now, as then, we would require visas the duration of which would be determined so that travelers would not be allowed to become residents. But the whole freedom of travel and likewise the whole freedom of uncensored communication—by air, by wire, by cable, by the post—would be reestablished.

It would be well for us to start even with the Soviet government in this matter of communication. While we have placed restraints on the freedom of satellite representatives, we have consistently maintained the decencies of international relationships with the Soviet government, while its satellites have cut themselves off from friendly relations with the rest of the world. This situation has extended over years through both war and peace. The example of the nations of the Western World persistently maintained against great provocation has had no effect whatever on the Soviet powers. They still persist in shutting us off from friendly and normal relationships and communications. In making the comprehensive peace proposals such as have been outlined, we should start by announcing that we will apply exactly the same restrictions on the travel of citizens and on the movements of accredited representatives that they apply against us. The power of example has failed. We will start even on this question of decency in international relationships.

Mr. President, while this proposal for peace and disarmament can be stated comprehensively in these very few paragraphs, it is necessary that we realize the serious implication of the proposal for us. It means throwing America open to travelers whom we suspect of having subversive purposes. We will let in Communists. Let us not blink that fact. But let us also remember that Russia will let in capitalists, as they will call any visitor from a capitalist country. This is going to be at least as unpalatable for them as for us. It is, in fact, going to be more dangerous for them than it is for us, for the institutions they have set up cannot be so easily maintained in the light of knowledge and free intercourse. The Politburo knows this, and this is the reason for the iron curtain.

We are not endangering our institutions to the same degree. While we have scared ourselves stiff, it is because we have faced subversive activities in a society which is already weakened by the necessities of military preparation, and which, in consequence, cannot devote itself wholeheartedly to the well-being of its citizens. When we can reverse our direction and purpose, nothing that Communists can say or do will divert the American people from the attainment of the economically high and the spiritually satisfying way of life which we are able to work for and attain.

Mr. President, our principal need in this respect is a revival of our faith in our institutions. Polluted rivers are purged of infection as they flow for miles under the bright sunshine. Communist infiltration will wither and die under the bright sunlight of knowledge and the fresh winds of freedom. Let us not lose our faith.

Can the Soviet government refuse such a proposal as this? It will indeed be hard for it to swallow, but will it not be harder yet to be put on record before the eyes of the world as refusing peace when it is offered completely and unequivocally? How can that government sell to the world the idea that the western nations, and particularly our own country, are warmongers seeking world domination? In the face of such an offer the proposition is absurd. No really peaceloving nation will entertain it for an instant. World sentiment will again turn our way. It cannot fail to do so. The Soviet government, branded as seeking conquest rather than peace, will either have to retire within its boundaries defeated and bare to internal dissension, or will have to join the ranks of the really peaceloving nations.

Mr. President, in making this proposal we cannot lose. If it is accepted we and the whole world win a disarmed peace. If it is rejected, the Soviet government stands convicted before the eyes of the world without a single excuse for its rejection of peace.

If it chooses to rejoin the peace-loving nations, the way to its aspirations held for generations and centuries, will be open. In a United Nations having united support of the nations and which has been successful in establishing a disarmed peace, many things are possible that are now impossible. For instance, the rulers of Russia have long fretted at their confinement. They have not had free and easy access to the great oceans of the world. From access to these oceans it has felt itself barred by more advantageously placed nations, by narrow seas subject to hostile military control, and by the icy barrier of the Arctic. This can be changed with such a peace agreement as has been described. It would be possible—nay advisable—to put the narrow seas in charge of the United Nations with a suitable police force for patrolling and safeguarding in a peaceful world. The narrow passages of Scandinavia, the Dardenelles, Gibraltar, the Suez Canal—yes, and the Panama Canal—can and should be under international control under those conditions. The age-old complaint of Russia would lose its justification.

Another complaint of the Soviet is that it has inadequate supplies of oil. So long as that government seeks to set the world in turmoil to add to its enormous conquests and to its millions of enslaved peoples, we must see to it that its supplies remain inadequate, that there be no doubt that this is our purpose; but in a disarmed and peace-seeking world we can change all that. Plans can be arrived at whereby Russian commercial access to the oil supplies of the world are enjoyed by that nation on the same terms as the rest of the world enjoys.

Aside from these two complaints, access to the oceans and to adequate oil supplies, the Soviet Government can make no just demands that the rest of the world is not ready and willing to meet.

There are many powerful and judicious voices which have been raised in support of some of the ideas which I have been setting forth. Among them I would call attention especially to Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers Union of the CIO, to our own fellow Senator, the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON], and to ex-Senator Tydings who, in spite of the fact that he was chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, made a bold and outright plea for disarmament. Both the Senator from Connecticut and Mr. Reuther have proposed that any plea for peace and disarmament should offer proposals on our part for a wide expansion in amount and application of the point 4 program to nations now groaning under the burden of armament. Mr. President, I agree with the desirability of this but I do not like to see the proposals used as a means of buying peace. The value of peace is without price. It must be sought as a precious jewel—not purchased in the open market.

However, the possibility of expanding point 4 has a great and necessary interest to us. Our rearming has painfully modified our economy and our way of life. It will affect them harmfully to a still greater degree as we get deeper and deeper into the policies and practices of the garrison state. But we must not dodge the fact that a sudden return to peacetime activities would likewise be disturbing. It might, in fact, have almost the effect of an atomic bomb on an economy and a way of life which have been geared to war. We have to face not merely the moral equivalent of war but the economic equivalent as well, which we must develop and build up rapidly for the period of transition if the necessity for war preparation disappears.

Point 4 is one of the transition policies to which we may have recourse. As rapidly as may be we can redirect productive, managerial, and engineering ability now concentrated on war to the development of the undeveloped parts of the world. Even should we do this as a free gift, it would still be better than the free and destructive expenditure of our blood and treasure in preparation for and carrying out of warfare. We will need this moral and economic equivalent of war if we are to shift our purposes and our direction.

But it is not only in the foreign field that we must find these equivalents. We have to redirect our energies to similar undertakings on the domestic front. We are, for instance, far behind in school building. We must see to it that our equipment of educational facilities are renewed, rebuilt, enlarged, and improved. There are innumerable other things we can do as the moral and economic equivalent of discarded warfare. All the streams of America should run fresh and pure to the sea. No sewage should taint their waters. No industrial refuse should pollute them. Billions upon billions upon billions we devote purposefully toward destruction. A part of these funds for an extended period must be directed toward the health, education, and higher satisfactions of the American citizen. The period of liquidation of the garrison state may become a period of constructive rebuilding of American life.

During this period of diminishing expenditures, we can expect diminishing taxation. This means increasing freedom. One of the means by which the garrison state destroys our freedom, is by that excess of taxation which destroys our ability to do for ourselves and makes us dependent on the Federal Government. The garrison state is the consort and breeder of the Socialist state.

Now, Mr. President, just a few words of recapitulation. We must look closely enough at our present position and course to recognize that we have lost the battle for the American way of life. Instead we are beginning our experience with the garrison state. On the domestic front the Soviet has already won. Military victory will be barren in the face of this grim fact.

We must also face the fact that we are losing the sympathy and support of other nations in the world, large and small, and that through the clever propaganda of the Soviet Government we are being made to appear as one of two contenders for supreme power in the affairs of the globe. We know this is not so. But it is not so clear to the outsider. We are losing on this field of battle as well.

If, as is true, we are seeking peace, we must make that so evident that no one can misunderstand it. We can make it evident by such a peace proposal as I have described. In the face of the clear evidence of such a proposal the Soviet Government will either have to accept or be branded before the world as seeking power over the world, as it has already sought and obtained power over so many hundreds of thousands of square miles and so many hundreds of millions of helpless captives.

This opportunity for peace must not be presented as an ultimatum to be accepted in a given number of days and then withdrawn. Our willingness to join in a disarmed peace must be set before the nations of the world as a permanent exhibit. We must proclaim it monthly, weekly, daily, hourly. It is always valid. The world's warmongers must never be allowed to forget it.

Our position before the world is that of holding a sword in one hand and a Bible in the other. The sword means that there can be no truce with violence, injustice, and tyrannical conquests. The Bible means that we hold to the doctrine of the brotherhood of all men with Christ under the Fatherhood of God and that we are prepared to incorporate that belief in a practical proposal for peace for the nations of the earth.

Our road is clear and the chance is here.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'CONOR in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I have asked the distinguished Senator to yield for a moment, in order that I may express my warm commendation of the splendid presentation he has made and the addition he has made to the so-called great debate with regard to where we go from here, in the great peace offensive which I agree with him we must undertake at once. I thank the Senator very much for his remarks.

Mr. FLANDERS. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I, too, should like to make a comment on the splendid presentation the Senator from Vermont has just made. I wish to say that I think his speech is a very fine follow-up of the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Vermont when, a few months ago he made a speech entitled "Let Us Try God."

Mr. FLANDERS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I should like to associate myself with the remarks just made by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] in regard to the very eloquent address just made in the Senate by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FLANDERS. I thank the Senator.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1612) to extend the authority of the President to enter into trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 1612) to extend the authority of the President to enter into trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THOMAS ALVA EDISON

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, yesterday was the birthday of one of our Nation's greatest men, Thomas Alva Edison. Nowhere in the world was he more widely respected and more greatly honored than in New Jersey, where he lived and worked for the greater part of his lifetime. The people of New Jersey revere his memory, as do the people of the entire country. At this point in my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD a tribute to Thomas Alva Edison, as presented by Ted Mack on the Ted

Mack Family Hour on Sunday, February 11, 1951.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—although I shall not object—let me say that when I was a student at Columbia University, from 1906 to 1910, several times I had the great privilege and opportunity of meeting Thomas Edison at his home, and there I met his family. Not only was he a great engineering genius, but he was a great American, and particularly a great family man. Therefore, I join with my distinguished colleague, the Senator from New Jersey, in saying that among all the outstanding Americans of his time and of his age, and particularly in association with John Burroughs, Harvey Firestone, and Henry Ford, Thomas A. Edison set one of the greatest examples of true progressivism of any American of his time.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS ALVA EDISON AS PRESENTED BY TED MACK ON THE TED MACK FAMILY HOUR ON SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1951

Once more we hear the strains of America, the Beautiful, and turn to our album of great Americans. Today is February 11, and more important, it is the birthday of one of the greatest minds that ever was produced in America—Thomas Alva Edison.

You know it's more than possible that I wouldn't be talking to you—there'd be no brilliant signs on Broadway, you'd have no radio, television or phonograph, and not even movies—oh, we'd be missing a great many things we take for granted today—if a boy hadn't been born in a simple little home at Milan, Ohio, in 1847.

Young Edison, from the stories we have at hand, seems to have been a typical American boy who tried to hatch chickens by sitting on them, set fire to his father's barn, ran a chemical laboratory in the cellar, and had a job of sorts as a candy butcher on the Grand Trunk Railroad. If any of you at home are wondering what's going to happen to your young hopefuls—after reading the midyear report cards—you may take comfort in knowing that Edison's school teachers expelled him as not worth teaching at all.

Tom Edison was taught from that time on by his mother, by a railroad telegrapher and by the "university of hard knocks." When he was 30 years old, he invented a tin-foil phonograph—and if you're interested, the very first words to come out of this wonderful machine were "Mary had a little lamb."

Of course, he hadn't been idle before that, you know. He had invented a stock ticker, helped make the first successful typewriter and automatic telegraph machine, and electric rheostat, the electric pen which made possible the mimeograph machine and the carbon transmitters for telephones. I'm sure the recording stars of today would get a real kick out of visiting Edison's first recording studio in West Orange, N. J. Singers and musicians sang or played into megaphones instead of out of them in those days.

There were other scientific discoveries, but the most important one to come up next was the invention of the electric light in 1879, when Tom Edison was only 37 years old.

What happened in the years since the first light bulb glowed in his laboratory is apparent in your own home every time you push a button, and it's certainly evident on the main street of every town in America.

In 1891 he applied for patents on the motion-picture camera—actually it was developed 2 years before that, 1889, but Edison was a little ambitious. He was trying to tie up his phonograph with the camera to make talking movies. That, friends, was 60 years ago.

Then he went on to develop electric semaphore signals for railroads; he invented the fluoroscope; and at one phase of his life, he worked on metal ore refining. Out of this work came iron, copper, and zinc miracles, and even a new cement.

You must realize that we're just skipping across the top of his many contributions to mankind. In among the familiar inventions, the name of Tom Edison touches safety lamps for miners, dictating machines, coal tar derivatives that provide many flavors and perfumes today.

For all his contributions to mankind, they've struck off medals in his honor, they've issued stamps in commemoration of his great works, but every time we turn on a light, ride in an automobile, a train, or a plane, every time we take part in the pleasures of radio, television, the movies, the theater—in fact, whenever we enjoy life in America today, we are walking around among the monuments a great man erected to the eternal American ideal that a country boy from Ohio has the opportunity of asserting his genius.

It can be done again because it's been done before. For that we thank Tom Edison and for that we're glad we're Americans.

ADVISABILITY AND EXTENT OF UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE DEFENSE OF WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in the all-important discussion regarding the advisability and extent of our participation in the defense of Western Europe, it is gratifying to note the wholehearted determination of outstanding citizens of both parties to present their well-considered views on this vital matter.

The people of the United States have already had the opportunity to weigh the various arguments and recommendations voiced both in the Halls of Congress and elsewhere. But too much cannot be said in relation to a decision which must be made in the near future. The lives and possessions of many Americans are involved; the future course of our Nation's history is at stake. Under these circumstances each one of us has a duty to submit his best judgment, whatever it may be worth.

I believe the President of the United States should consult Congress regarding the important phases of our troop assignments to Western Europe. I have in mind the definition of "consult," as given in a leading dictionary, as follows: "to ask the advice of, to take counsel with, etc." Such a proceeding negatives the idea of simply allowing the Congress to express itself, after which the President would do as he pleased.

Nor do I think any great difficulty will be encountered if the President takes Congress into consultation, in the true sense of that word. Members of Congress on both sides of the aisle are possessed of the same high degree of patriotism as is to be found in the executive branch—no greater, but no less. There will be found in the Senate and House of Representatives earnest and devoted public servants who are as zealous in safeguarding our Nation's interest as any other representatives of this democracy.

When these true Americans in the Congress are consulted by the President as to the components of any United States expeditionary force they will respond patriotically. Any proposed plan must, of course, be based upon practical considerations, and be definitely required for the security of our country and for the containment of communism, which is a menacing threat to liberty and freedom.

Congress should be consulted as to troops for Europe, not only because it is in keeping with the understanding at the time of approval of the North Atlantic Pact, but because such joint action of the Congress and executive branch will be the surest guarantee of national unity. The Members of the Congress are truly representative of the will of the American people. They reflect the attitude and determination of the citizenry. This is an all-important consideration in the creation and perpetuation of support for the vital decisions upon which the lives and possessions of our people will depend.

I say this as one who has consistently supported foreign-aid programs. Since that epoch-making message of March 1947, antedating the anti-Communist program for Greece and Turkey, and continuing through the successive steps which were designed to rehabilitate the democracies of Western Europe, I have voted for the different outlays. Furthermore, I am convinced that without these programs, to which we gave unstinted support, the iron curtain would long ago have enveloped other nations, just as Poland and Czechoslovakia and other peoples are now subjected to Communist domination.

But in casting those various votes for European aid in huge amounts, I did so with the understanding that Congress would have voice in the determination of policy involving the sending of men, just as we were implored to give support to plans for the sending of dollars to Europe.

The instinct of self-preservation impels us to maintain our position of world leadership. It is not that America has any aggressive intentions. Rather, it is that our Communist foe represents a global menace, and that, the further his ideology is spread, the more imminent is the danger to our security.

It is incumbent upon this Nation to reaffirm allegiance to the doctrine of collective security. We must not abandon Europe. Not only would such a course mean the repudiation of our pledges and the loss of the great military and economic investment already made but it would represent an open invitation to Moscow to strike whenever the time appears propitious.

Furthermore it is not sufficient to conclude that we can fulfill our objectives alone by air and sea power. History and experience, not only of past decades but contemporaneously have demonstrated that in addition to these two mighty forces there is a third essential, namely, ground troops of infantry and artillery.

Reinforcements must be available to our fellow members of the Atlantic Pact. To hold that we will not give assistance in this matter until and unless the foe has already inflicted his damage would be to defeat the very purpose of the program long since adopted.

Not to be ignored also is the fact that we already have troops in Germany who must not be abandoned. Obviously we cannot allow these Americans to be the victims of a ruthless enemy.

But a policy to commit ground troops to Europe should have qualifications attached. There is a limit to what the United States can do, as Korea has shown. Our European allies should understand in advance that they cannot expect too sizable a portion of our limited infantry and artillery. Possibly, if they had been warned when hostilities opened in Korea of this fact, they would not have thrust so great a burden upon the United States as was done. We must not repeat our all-out assumption of defense, as has occurred in the Korean crisis, where the United States has suffered tremendously and disproportionately.

An inflexible mathematical formula cannot be decided in advance of an emergency. It is no more possible in advance to say that 16⅔ percent is all that we will commit any more than it would be reassuring to know that while 10 planes might be needed to cover a given target, only 9 can be allowed under the technical blueprint. Britain could never have determined in advance that after Dunkerque so many troops and supplies would go to Egypt, to France, to Africa, to Malta—and when. The determination of "adequacy" must take into account the needs of the hour and the availability of other forces. We must leave such tactical and strategic decisions to the military strategists who are the better informed as to what is required, lest perhaps, through shortsighted policy, we jeopardize the lives of American boys already dispatched to foreign lands.

But all this is not to say that limitations should not be placed. I do not believe in giving a blank check to anybody, whether it be the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States or to anyone else. We would never countenance the giving of a blank check for the expenditure of United States Treasury moneys for domestic purposes. Much more serious would it be to consider giving such unlimited authority over lives of American boys upon whom the future of our Nation and of the world will depend. How best to accomplish the objective of commitment without jeopardizing the entire program is obviously the difficult question. Consideration should be given to imposing a requirement that the President must receive the approval of Congress at stated intervals as to the commitments made in the intervening time. If such approval could not be secured from the people's representatives, then no additional troops could be sent.

In addition, consideration should be given to the establishment of a joint bipartisan emergency policy committee of possibly 12 Members of the Congress, who would be consulted regularly as to developing needs in the European defense area and who would be called upon continuously for consultation by the President of the United States. Such a committee should include representatives of the Foreign Relations, the Armed Services, and the Policy Committees of both parties of the Senate and of the House. If additional appointments to the group are necessary, the presiding officers should take this action. Members of this emergency committee should meet at stated intervals, throughout the critical period, with the President, the Secretary of State, and military officials, so that they would continue to be informed of the latest reports as to changing conditions. More important, they should be consulted in the formulation of policy and in connection with further decisions.

More and more it would seem necessary that Russia, and all the nations of the world, be kept informed of basic United States reactions and intentions with regard to the matter of preserving the peace and security of the world. Had Russia, Communist China, and North Korea been fully convinced of the determination of the United States not to permit violation of the independence of Southern Korea, I am sure that they would have been less ready to face the opposition which the free nations have offered in that area.

Undoubtedly, if the United States forces and armaments are to be poured into any and every area where Communist Russia directs one of her satellites to strike; if they are to be dissipated in attacks upon those subservient forces, we can well wear ourselves out fighting a windmill, like Don Quixote of fiction, while Russia sits by and awaits the day when she can send her own forces into action against a United States which has been so weakened by successive incidents that our ability to defend our freedom may be sorely impaired.

It must be clearly made known to the Kremlin that further Communist aggression anywhere in the world is tantamount to an attack upon the United States. Let it be made clearly evident that efforts to counteract such incidents will be directed at the oppression center from which they stem, namely, Moscow and Russia's points of military production, as well as against the satellites who are actually prodded into the attack.

With every new area gained through aggression, Russia strengthens herself by manpower and natural resources, and by so much weakens the power of the free nations of the world for final resistance.

To permit absorption by the Communists of the resources of Western Europe, for instance, or of Southeastern Asia, could well be to produce the final increment to Communist strength and productive facilities which would make the difference between victory and possible defeat for the United States and the nations allied with her. Every hour we delay in making such a position known, every additional square mile of territory yielded by such delay, adds by so much to the task that ultimately and surely will confront us.

Mr. President, there is one point about which I agree entirely with former President Herbert Hoover. Our allies in Western Europe must not undermine our efforts by continuing to supply our Communist—and common—enemies the products and raw materials of a strategic nature or that serve to bolster the behind-the-line economy of those enemy countries, to which Mr. Hoover referred in his speech of last Friday.

Certainly nothing could be more open to condemnation than is a policy on the part of any of these nations whom we propose to help, of continuing to benefit financially and otherwise by trade with nations who are seeking to destroy both them and us and who will make use of all supplies thus sent them, in one way or another, toward our defeat and destruction.

This particular point needs stressing at this time because of the information possessed by the subcommittee investigating shipments to Communist areas regarding the vast amounts of highly strategic items—copper, steel, and their products; electric machinery, machine tools, transportation items, and so forth, which have been flowing to the satellite countries and to China, and to bordering nations which have been transshipping those items to the very areas which now are in open or at least actual hostilities against us.

To summarize, it is earnestly suggested that—

First. To refuse any troops to Western Europe would let that whole area go by default should Russia attack; much of that area has been overrun twice or more since 1914. The people's "will to fight" depends understandably to a large extent on the belief in the possibility of successful defense.

Second. Our planning should not make it possible for Russia to walk in almost unopposed, and then have opportunity to attack this country from Atlantic bases when she has consolidated her hold upon Europe. Rather we must assist our European allies with troops and armament to defend their countries, to hold and delay the foe, to fight our battle and theirs, while we carry out our major task of destroying the enemy's home, military, and productive centers by air attack to prevent reinforcements.

Third. If Korea has shown anything at all, it is that air and sea power alone cannot repulse and destroy masses of foot soldiers.

Fourth. Troops furnished Europe must be according to an all-over program that allows for adequate home defense; but any rigid proportional allotment of such troops to troops of other nations obviously must depend upon conditions as they develop.

Fifth. Congress much be consulted—not on the basis of a fait accompli, a decision already made, but as to whether troops should be sent, when, and how many.

Sixth. Realizing the unwieldiness of a policy of Presidential consultation with large congressional committees, I suggest a bipartisan consultation group, from both Houses of Congress, consisting of Members of each party from the Foreign Affairs, Armed Services and Policy Committees, who would be delegated by the Congress to represent them and to consult on necessary decisions with the President in matter of troops dispatched in an emergency.

Seventh. United States must demand that all anti-Communist nations be included in the defense set-up. To exclude Spain, Turkey, or Greece would be to weaken a system of defense which, at its strongest, will be subjected to all-out strain in case of Russian aggression against Western Europe.

Eighth. Insistence that United Nations allied with us stop supplying enemies with needed supplies and material.

Ninth. Concentration upon defense to exclusion of all nonvital spending for construction or for expansion or initiation of Government social services.

It is heartening, when one considers the vast differences of opinion which naturally follow the free thought of the American people and their leaders on vital aspects of foreign policy in the past, to realize how much basic unity of thought now prevails with respect to United States European commitments, despite all the apparent sound and fury.

All the vehement arguments for ceilings on the amounts of troops to be sent, or for proportionate allocations of American troops to those of other countries involved, serve but to emphasize the very important general agreement on the necessity of aid from this country to the nations of Western Europe, particularly in the form of armaments.

Happily there is a resurgence of determination that the cause of liberty and freedom shall not be defeated. Further, there is general realization among our people that, within the Atlantic coalition, there lies the best hope for resistance to the enemy.

To the undying credit of the American people let it be said that they approve of the outlay from our Treasury of whatever is necessary for the fulfillment of the extensive rearmament program which will supply not only our own troops but will assist Western Europe in building its defenses against possible Communist aggression.

Also, as a dire warning to Moscow is the determination of our country to meet force with force and to carry the fight to the homeland of the enemy, if the Soviets launch an attack upon Western Europe.

In the light of recent developments and fortified by the definite state of unity among the American people which has been noted, particularly since General Eisenhower's survey and report, the United States can be depended upon to do its part to prevent the overthrow of democratic institutions and to frustrate the onrush of Communist aggression.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am very much delighted to find a Democrat among my friends on the other side of the aisle hitting the sawdust trail. Not only do we find a Democrat who agrees on at least two points with former President Herbert Hoover's program but, if I may do so, I most respectfully suggest to my distinguished friend from Maryland that within the next few months I think he will probably agree with Mr. Hoover's program in its entirety.

Do not let us forget, Mr. President, that it was a Democratic President who first recognized Russia, after Herbert Hoover had declined to do so. Let us not forget that it was during a Democratic administration that this Nation engaged in World War I and World War II.

Well do I remember early in World War II Winston Churchill saying over the radio:

> We don't want American boys over here. We don't need them. Just give us the tools. Give us the guns.

Mr. President, the Connally resolution which was adopted by the Senate provided for a second front. What did we find within a few days after we adopted the resolution? Only a few weeks after Mr. Churchill had said over the radio that the British had all the manpower they needed out of 116,000 casualties in the Normandy invasion 86,000 were American boys.

A few days ago President Truman appointed a new commission. He said the purpose of appointing the Commission was to find out why American people did not go to the polls and vote. It is particularly appropriate today, since it is the anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's birth, to call the attention of the Senate to the great fact that Abraham Lincoln found that the political parties of his day were not doing a good job. Therefore he organized the Republican Party. We tried very hard a short time ago to have a new constitutional amendment adopted. Did we get the support of the Democrats? We did not. In the elections of 1940, 1944, and 1948 we could as well have had one party. People who were opposed, as some of us were, to sending American boys all over the world, sending our treasure to every country on the globe, spending $200,000,000 for tobacco for citizens of foreign lands, buying $200,000 worth of Coca-Cola for foreigners, purchasing and sending to them didies, and all of that sort of thing, had no place to go. The Republican bipartisan policy, for which my friend made his plea only a moment ago, stopped us. We heard Mr. Dewey, the Republican candidate, asking for more help for Western Europe than had been asked for even by President Truman. He asked for more men and larger contingents of boys to be sent to foreign countries than had been asked for even by Mr. Truman. A few nights ago Mr. Dewey again renewed his plea over the radio.

Mr. President, why does Mr. Truman want to appoint a commission now to find out why the American people do not go to the polls? Why is it that nearly 50,000,000 Americans stayed home at the last election? They stayed home because there was no candidate and there could be no candidate under the Constitution after the Republican and Democratic national conventions had met and made nominations, to represent the rank and file of the American people, who were opposed to sending American troops abroad, and who were opposed to continuing to send billions and billions of dollars abroad. Mr. President, I suggest to my distinguished friend that some day, when he is at liberty and he has nothing else to do, he look up some of the old CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, and read some of the speeches which were made by Members of the Senate after World War I. My distinguished friend could find no more instructive reading. Senator after Senator, some of whom are still Members of this body, rose on the floor and said that we had made a mistake, that we had no business getting into World War I. I refer him to the RECORD.

Mr. President, in Europe, before World War I, there existed the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It was over a thousand years old. It was made up of 19 different nations. The house of Hapsburg was older than the royal house of England. After World War I a Democratic President took a trip to Europe. Woodrow Wilson said, "We are going to have self-determination of nations over here." The nations of Europe had been working together. They almost had a common currency. It was possible to travel from one country to another without any difficulty. They almost had a real United States of Europe. All that was torn to pieces. Let us take the case of poor Poland. England guaranteed the sovereignty of Poland. England said, "We are going to war to preserve Poland." The record shows how England preserved Poland. It does not take the senior Senator from North Dakota to show the lamentable job which England did on that project.

Mr. President, everyone knows how national conventions are rigged. President Truman does not need to appoint a new commission to find out why nearly 50,000,000 American people did not vote at the last election. Let him pick up a newspaper and read the accounts that were written at the time the national conventions were held. Well do I remember that the Republican convention at Kansas City was delayed 25 hours until Andrew Mellon from Pennsylvania could appear before it to tell whom to nominate for President. Well do I remember that twice the lawyer for the House of Morgan had them nominate the candidate for President of the United States.

Every one of us is familiar with what took place at the Democratic convention at Chicago when a loud-speaker microphone was installed in the basement of the convention hall, through which a fellow yelled in a loud voice, "We want Roosevelt. We want Roosevelt." A few weeks later, in Philadelphia, we find the Republicans nominating a man who in the primary had not carried even one State. They nominated Wendell Willkie. He had not carried one primary election. A few days before the convention we found the London Times saying, "There is a great demand for the nomination of Wendell Willkie." They said that only a few days before the nomination took place. Then we find the House of Morgan sending its representative to Philadelphia. Fake tickets were issued to men and women, who, after being paid a certain amount, went into the balcony and shouted, "We want Willkie. We want Willkie." They shouted "We want Willkie" from morning until night.

Mr. President, we tried to secure the adoption of a constitutional amendment. My distinguished friend the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] tried to help us the last time it was brought before the Senate. It was an amendment under which all the people could go into a primary election and cast their vote for their candidate for President, in the same way that they can now nominate a candidate for governor, Representative, and Senator.

Mr. President, I well recall the great fight put up by the late George Norris for the adoption of a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of President of the United States. Senator Norris was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and he worked, not weeks, not months, but years, in an endeavor to get that constitutional amendment adopted. But in spite of his great prestige, in spite of the fact that he was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in spite of the fact that he finally got the joint resolution reported from the committee and upon the floor of the Senate, it was emasculated until he himself could not recognize his own proposal. Then, finally, it was defeated by an overwhelming majority.

I congratulate the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] for his assistance some months ago when we finally got one-third of the membership of this body to vote for the submission of an amendment providing for the direct election of President of the United States, and providing in the same amendment for a primary election.

Ah, Mr. President, I well remember when in my own State a citizen could not vote directly for a United States Senator, and no citizen had that right until a constitutional amendment making provision for it was ratified. Today no one can vote directly for a President of the United States, and I submit that one reason why 50,000,000 remained at home at the last election was because they were so disgusted at what took place at the Republican convention and the Democratic convention that they did not care to vote at all.

Frankly, Mr. President, I do not blame the people. So far as the foreign policy was concerned, what difference was there between the parties? There was not any difference. Yet only a short time before that Burton K. Wheeler, then a Member of this body, a distinguished Senator from the State of Montana, speaking in Los Angeles just before we entered into World War II had an audience of 108,000 people. Did those 108,000 people have a chance to express themselves?

So today, on Abraham Lincoln's Birthday, I call attention to the fact that Mr. Lincoln, not liking the parties which were then in existence, organized the Republican Party. I only wish that today the Republican Party was still enunciating the principles of Abraham Lincoln as he announced them at the time the party was established.

My distinguished colleague the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], earlier this afternoon mentioned George Washington and George Washington's Farewell Address. He referred particularly to the part in which Washington said that we should avoid entangling alliances with other countries. It would have been a pretty good thing if we had followed the advice of Gen. George Washington.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article which was published by the North Dakota Taxpayers Association which says that North Dakota's share of the Federal debt is greater than the total taxable value of all real and personal property in the State of North Dakota.

Time and time again upon this floor I stated the amount of the debt which would be borne by every county in Wisconsin, in Minnesota, in North and South Dakota, and the same information was available as to every other State. I showed, for example, that the total debt of a small county such as Cass County, N. Dak., just for the Marshall plan, would amount to more than $16,000,000.

To show how little the rank and file of the people know about it, I may state that one day I went into the gallery of the Senate, where three of the leading bankers of Fargo, N. Dak., were sitting, when the Marshall plan was being discussed. All three of these bankers were for the Marshall plan, and I said to the first of them, "How much will the share of Cass County be?" He said, "About $250,000." I asked the next one and he said, "about $350,000." The next thought it might be half a million dollars. These bankers are supposed to know all about fiscal matters, but not one of them knew that the share of Cass County, N. Dak., would be $16,000,000.

Mr. President, I agree with nearly every word of what Herbert Hoover has said in his last two speeches. He is a man who has spent the major portion of his adult life in foreign countries. He has taken trips all over the world since he was President. I say frankly that I was shocked when I picked up the New York Post yesterday and saw on the front page a statement to the effect that the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, was not even going to call Mr. Hoover before the Committee on Foreign Relations. Who are the men who know so much, the men who do not want to hear a former President of this country even testify? I was delighted to find in the same article a statement to the effect that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], although he said he did not agree entirely with what former President Hoover had said, nevertheless was going to ask that Mr. Hoover be requested to appear and testify.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he read the report of the former President about the reorganization of the Post Office Department, and how many hundreds of thousands of dollars he thought he could save. Does the Senator believe he could save that money in the Post Office?

Mr. LANGER. Let me preface my answer to the question by saying that when I received that report, I wrote a letter to Mr. Johnson, chairman of the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report. Among those who served on the Hoover Commission there were prominent labor leaders, and such men as our distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and men high in business and in industry. I wrote to Mr. Johnson and said, "I want to know who wrote this report. Did Mr. Hoover write it? How many meetings have you had of all the directors of the Hoover Commission?"

Would not my distinguished colleague be anxious to get the answer which I received from Mr. Johnson? They meet once a year, and many of them are not present when the committee meets. So we find that this report is not a report of President Hoover at all. It is a report of Mr. Johnson and his staff.

But answering the Senator's question directly, I say that I believe a great deal of money can be saved in the Post Office Department. I believe the suggestions made were good.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Did the Senator speak of "Johnson" or "Johnston"? I should like to have him clear that up. I was not the one to whom he wrote.

Mr. LANGER. "Johnson" is not the Senator. I gladly clear that up. The name of my distinguished colleague from South Carolina is "JOHNSTON." The chairman of the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report is a man by the name of "Johnson." The names are very much alike, but there is a "t" in one and not in the other.

As I said, I was very much delighted when I found that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] announced he intended to invite Mr. Herbert Hoover before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed again in the RECORD, at this point in my remarks, the table prepared by the North Dakota Taxpayers Association, showing that North Dakota's share of the national debt is much greater than the total taxable value of all real and personal property in the State of North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

North Dakota's share of Federal debt is much greater than total taxable value of all real and personal property in State

Sources: Valuation, State tax commissioner; Federal debt, U. S. Treasurer's Report, November 1950; population, Bureau of Census.

Mr. LANGER. I might add that the record shows that the share of each individual in North Dakota—and I am not now talking about a family, Mr. President, for if a man has a wife and eight children the total family share would be ten times as much—the share of each individual in North Dakota of the $256,598,297,426 of Federal debt amounts to $1,708. That is what every North Dakotan, not every family, but every individual in North Dakota, owes.

I have here the list which I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of every county in the State, showing the population of each county and each county's share of the Federal debt, as well as the net taxable valuation of each county in 1950. If my distinguished friend from South Carolina is interested in the details, I shall be glad to secure them for him. The total population of North Dakota in 1950 was 617,965. The share of the Federal debt of the counties of North Dakota is $1,055,484,220. The taxable valuation in 1950 was $559,647,225.

That, Mr. President, shows where the Democratic Party has led us. That is the result of permitting the party to remain in power since 1932.

In all honesty and humility, Mr. President, I wish to say that the Republican Party, under the bipartisan program, is partly to blame. I notice that my distinguished friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is smiling at what I am now saying. When he was running for the Senate in the State of Minnesota I heard him say over the radio that he blamed the Republicans just as much as he did the Democrats because of the so-called bipartisan policy. Well do I remember how the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota rolled those words under his tongue. I also remember the great impression his statement made upon the rank and file of the people of the State of North Dakota. I can understand why my distinguished friend from Minnesota defeated by nearly 300,000 votes his opponent, who had voted for the giving of all the vast sums of foreign aid money, who had voted that the United States should take care of a great portion of Europe. Since that time Asia has been added. As one Senator stated today, we are now going to take care of Asia also.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I only want to help the Senator from North Dakota make the RECORD accurate. I must remind my good friend, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, that my charges made in the last campaign were not that we were doing too much internationally. My charges were that we were not doing enough or doing it well enough. I believe possibly it is well at this point to say, in view of the fine eulogy by the Senator from North Dakota, that the people who heard me applauded my remarks, and liked what I said. They liked what I said because they believed it to be the responsibility of the United States to do this job internationally. It so happens that the junior Senator from Minnesota was taking issue with his opponent on the basis that we were not following through on the bipartisan foreign policy.

I merely wanted to clarify the RECORD, because I know the Senator from North Dakota and the junior Senator from Minnesota do not see eye to eye on our foreign policy. In fact we see, let me put it in this way, rather back to back instead of eye to eye.

Mr. LANGER. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota that he flatters himself. He did not receive those votes because the people of Minnesota thought he was going to do more for the people of Europe and Asia than the man against whom he was running. They voted against Mr. Ball because they did not like his record. They said "We do not know what he, the man running against him, will do, but he cannot do any worse so far as aid to foreign countries is concerned and we are going to take a chance on him."

I call to the attention of my distinguished friend that his distinguished colleague from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], speaking over the radio when he was running against former Senator Shipstead, said, "I would not have voted for the loan to England." Both former Senator Ball and former Senator Shipstead are from his own State of Minnesota. When my colleague [Mr. YOUNG] ran for Senator the last time he stressed the fact that he also would not have voted for the loan to England.

In closing I want to make a prophecy, Mr. President. I prophesy that in a few years, it may not be long, some of the very Senators who are now upon the floor of the Senate will do what Senators did after World War I, rise on the floor and apologize to the American people for having participated in the present foreign policy, for having sent billions and billions and billions of dollars to foreign countries, when at this very moment there are 10,000,000 families in America trying to live on $2,000 a year.

My distinguished friend from Minnesota is a member of the board of directors of an organization known as the Institute of National Affairs. That organization has in its employ as executive secretary a man named Dewey Anderson. A short time ago I placed in the RECORD a report made by Dewey Anderson, who, I assume, was chosen to the position he now holds, by my distinguished colleague from the State of Minnesota. In that report Mr. Dewey Anderson gave figures to show that there are some families in the United States trying to live on a thousand dollars a year. Those are not my figures. They are the figures of Mr. Dewey Anderson, a leading economist, selected by my distinguished colleague from the State of Minnesota himself.

So, Mr. President, I today venture the assertion that if hard times come, if, for example, we should have a drought such as we experienced some years ago in the Northwest, if conditions become bad, some of the Senators who are so anxious to vote billions upon billions of dollars to almost every other country on the face of the globe and some of them who are now saying, "We are going to send our boys all over the world," will change their position.

I remember that the former Senator from South Dakota, Mr. Gurney, during the Eightieth Congress introduced the selective-service draft bill. I then asked him, "To what countries on the globe are you going to send American boys?" Former Senator Gurney said, "To every single country in the world to which the President of the United States may care to send them."

Mr. President, although I may be in a hopeless minority, I wish to say that I do not propose to send American boys all over the earth. I voted against the appropriation of every dollar of money which is going to any foreign country, with the exception of the appropriations for UNRRA, representing $2,000,000,000 to feed the naked and the hungry. What a mess was made with the UNRRA program before it was finished. Russia handed out our money, or the food purchased with our money to other countries of Europe. Under that program England handed out our money in South America. The United States received no credit.

Today what do we find? We find the bipartisan crowd made up of Democrats and Republicans alike again saying they are going to vote to send more and more American boys across to Europe. On the other hand, we find the President of the United States saying we are not at war. Mr. President, if we are not at war, I suggest that some Senators who are so anxious to send American boys across the sea, go to Walter Reed Hospital and talk to some of the boys there who have no arms, who have no legs, and some of those who are unable to feed themselves, and have to have nurses to take care of them morning, noon, and night. Let Senators talk with those boys and find out whether or not we are at war. They can tell us, Mr. President.

KOREA AND THE THIRTY-EIGHTH PARALLEL

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina obtained the floor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me, to permit me to make an insertion in the RECORD and to make a few comments thereon, with the understanding that I shall not take more than 2 minutes to do so?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the body of the RECORD a dispatch from London concerning a statement by His Majesty's Government, made by Prime Minister Attlee, to the effect that the British Government opposes another crossing of the thirty-eighth parallel.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LONDON.—Prime Minister Attlee announced that the British Government opposes another crossing of the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea until after full consultation in the United Nations.

Attlee said in Commons it was especially important to get the views of the nations fighting in Korea.

Attlee said that while Britain loyally supports the United Nations and considers China the aggressor, "the question of sanctions is not one which we can support until there is no hope of settlement."

He said the thirty-eighth parallel is not a military line but just an imaginary line on the map, and that therefore there might be unintentional crossings here and there at times.

But, referring to any planned intention to cross the parallel, Attlee said:

"In our view the thirty-eighth parallel ought not to be crossed again until there has been full consultation with the United Nations and, in particular, with those member states who are contributing forces to Korea."

Attlee criticized those who insist that the issue in the Far East is solely between the United States and China.

"The issue is between the United Nations and Korea," he said. "It is just stupid to suggest that China has done nothing in this. It is equally stupid to suggest that His Majesty's Government have no policy of their own."

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I merely wish to comment briefly on the dispatch, within the time allowed me.

On February 1, by a vote of 44 to 7, and with 8 absent, the General Assembly of the United Nations determined that the Chinese Communists were aggressors in Korea. Twelve days have passed since that action was taken by the United Nations. I think the Senate of the United States and the American people are entitled to know what sanctions, if any, have been proposed by the United Nations, whether they be economic or military.

I also believe that both General MacArthur and General Ridgway are entitled to have a clear understanding as to just what the policy on the part of the United Nations is in regard to the Korean situation. Those generals have had their hands tied behind them up to this time by the limitation which prohibits the United Nations forces from attacking military targets north of the Yalu River, whether they be supply depots, air bases, arsenals, or troop concentration points from which reinforcements are being sent to attempt to destroy the United Nations forces in Korea.

Mr. President, it is bad enough to ask men to fight and to risk their lives when they are placed under those very severe handicaps which are recognized as such by every responsible American commander in Korea and by every soldier, sailor, and airman fighting in Korea. If His Majesty's Government is going to propose that the United Nations forces not go north of the thirty-eighth parallel, it is time that information was very clearly outlined in specific detail. What, in effect, this will mean, Mr. President, is that the Communists of North Korea will be assured that they will have the opportunity to build up a Korean government north of the thirty-eighth parallel, and it will make military operations very difficult if this limitation is placed upon General MacArthur and General Ridgway.

However, more important than that, Mr. President it is time that we have a clear understanding as to what the Prime Minister of Great Britain proposes to do in the event the forces of the Republic of Korea are going to go north of the thirty-eighth parallel. I was in Korea last November. I am convinced that the Republic of Korea will never be satisfied with having that country divided at the thirty-eighth parallel. The fact of the matter is that Korea cannot exist economically or politically if divided at the thirty-eighth parallel.

I predict that Mr. Attlee will have some difficulties with the government of the Republic of Korea and with the 38,000,000 free people of South Korea if he attempts once again to establish a Communist regime north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

CONFIRMATION OF ARMY, NAVY, AIR FORCE, AND MARINE NOMINATIONS

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield briefly to me?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that I may report, from the Committee on Armed Services, various and sundry routine nominations and promotions in the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marine Corps. These nominations have been before the committee for some 2 or 3 weeks, and they are reported unanimously by the committee. In the interest of economy, and to avoid the expense of having to print the nominations in the RECORD on a subsequent occasion, I also ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, that the nominations may be confirmed en bloc forthwith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia that, as in executive session, he be permitted to report the nominations from the Committee on Armed Services? The Chair hears none, and the report of the nominations is received.

Is there now objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia that the nominations be considered at this time?

Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified immediately of the confirmations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

UNITED STATES MILITARY AND CIVILIAN POLICY

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I believe that there is a fear among the people of the United States that we are facing another war. It is my belief that that is exactly what Russia wants us to believe. I am convinced that at the present time Russia wishes our people to become so frightened and so stirred up that the United States will rush headlong into full armament and at the same time cripple the domestic economy. Russia wishes the United States to do that, not only to make our country spend money, but also in order to keep the Russian people in fear that America will attack Russia.

Today the Russian leaders are telling their people that the United States intends to attack them. Mr. President, the people of America know that is not true. On the other hand, the American people are saying that Russia is going to attack us. I do not believe that is true as of now. On the other hand, I do not want anyone to think that in time of peace we should not prepare for war. We must do so. At the same time we must keep our feet on the ground, so to speak; we must keep our economy sound, in order to pay off the enormous debt we owe and keep our people employed, in order that the Russians will not have a fertile field in which the Communists can stir up strife and discontent and form their own fifth columns in America.

For that reason I have prepared some remarks on this subject, to let the people of the United States know that we do not fear Russia, that we can take care of Russia, and that we want Russia to know that we can take care of her if a war is forced upon us. We want Russia to know, also, that we have allies, who will assist us in case of a war. We should let Russia know those things.

Mr. President, in the events of the past month, I sense a heartening development in the return to the national scene of the fine perspective and moral judgments that have always served America so well in periods of trial and conflict.

I feel and see, as you must, Mr. President, a growing measure of real unity that comes from a true understanding of the issues in world affairs and from their full and honest discussion to which we here and all our citizens have been treated by the Members of this Congress.

We may well take comfort from the fact that in this hour of great challenge, we have proved again that we have leaders who, by their scholarship, patriotism, and statesmanship, have demonstrated their ability to deal with the complex and numerous problems whose constructive solutions are so tied in with our national well-being and the future security and prosperity of the democratic world.

As this debate has gone forward, all of us have been made increasingly aware of the fact that we are engaged in a struggle for the continuance of our American way of life. The values we hold dear are daily under contest in many parts of the world. We cannot take anything for granted; but, rather, we must make a positive and constant effort to secure and expand the rights which we as Americans consider priceless.

In the recent past I believe we have been prone to bring an emotional rather than a factual and objective appraisal to the global situation. Once we enthrone fear as the basis of our plans and programs and are confronted with its extensions at every turn, then we are subject to gross and costly error. That is why I am particularly glad to note at the present hour a return to sanity and realism. Once we fully consult our own resources and project them into global strategy in relation to the assets of our allies of the free world, we find that our position is promising, not dismaying; we have the task of making the most of what we have, speedily and with intelligence.

As to the current differences on use of American military manpower abroad, I am glad to note that they appear to be receding to the point of what would be reasonable under the circumstances for the protection of world peace.

The Russians are generally credited with having available for action in Western Europe a striking force of about 175 divisions. To this force it may be expected naturally that they could muster up substantial additional reserves. This standing army, augmented by the vast armament which the Soviet Union possesses and by the standing troops in the satellite countries, we know is far beyond what Stalin and his Kremlin masters require in order to protect the national interests of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The physical powers and the foreign policy of the Soviets clearly constitute a threat to world peace. Of this we must never lose sight, no matter how greatly we may be tempted to shy away from this distasteful situation.

In the face of this threat, we have the job of rallying the resources of the democratic world to meet the situation, and of developing such strength that our would-be enemies will realize the futility of contesting our strength.

Before we get on with the development of the factors of strength in America, I believe we should proceed cautiously and not write off Europe at one stroke, as so many of our self-styled experts are inclined to do. There are substantial anti-Russian forces in Europe, and they constitute elements which need to be reckoned with. At the moment I am making particular reference to nations which are not technically associated with the Atlantic Treaty powers. Thought needs to be given to advancing their availability and increasing their effectiveness. I feel that we may be certain General Eisenhower is giving due attention to these forces in his calculations and over-all plans.

Yugoslavia, for instance, has an army of 32 divisions, or 400,000 men; Greece, 8 divisions, or 130,000 men; Turkey, 30 divisions, or 550,000 men, and Spain, 30 divisions, or 450,000 men.

Let us examine all this aspect for a moment. We know that Tito's men would have their work cut out for them, since Stalin has approximately three-quarters of a million satellite soldiers in arms around the borders of Yugoslavia. Nevertheless Tito stands as a serious obstacle to any Soviet walk-over of Europe. While the Grecian Army probably would be occupied mainly at home, it is well trained, and even though small, it would act as a road block to a Soviet blitz.

Any way we look at it Turkey and Spain have forces that could play an important part in the western defense. Judged by professional standards, Spain is said to have one of the best armies in Europe, and we all know the battle strength of the Turks. If the military forces of the nations I have just enumerated were to be added to the military strength now being developed for General Eisenhower's command, there would be a solid basis for hope that the Soviets could be withstood until the full powers of the free nations could make themselves totally felt.

What are the prospects of such an all-Europe front against Soviet expansionism? Turkey has clearly lined up with the west against Russia, and the Turkish force would appear to be clearly available. American money and equipment have been made available to the Turks to bolster their military strength. Turkish soldiers are in the thick of the fight in Korea. Staff liaison would appear to be the principal need, and this could be arranged. In my opinion, too, the quicker we arm Western Germany the better it will be for the allies; for if war should start now, it would start at the Rhine, but if we had Western Germany, then it would not begin at the Rhine, but would begin on the other side of Western Germany, which would be to our advantage. I think the military leaders of the allies should train a German Army. I am not now speaking of Germany's coming back and being built up immediately, but we need them, and we had just as well be sensible about it and handle them to our advantage.

When we come to the western fringe of Europe the situation is different. Only within recent weeks has the United States restored full diplomatic recognition to the Franco government. With the appointment of an Ambassador to Spain, America gave signal recognition to the realities of the day. The world picture made our new policy advisable. Too long did we harken to the promptings of voices which contended that the rightist leanings of the Franco government could be modified by the application of political and economic pressures. Our military authorities have long urged the resumption of diplomatic relations with Spain. Although General Eisenhower did not find it convenient to confer with Franco on his recent tour, it would be well to hear what he has to say about linking up the assets of Spain with those of other European nations banding in defense against Communist aggression.

While we are on this aspect of the general question of husbanding our global strengths, it will not be amiss to say a few words regarding Japan. The Chinese Communist invasion of Korea clearly points up the need for a peace treaty with Japan, concluded at the earliest possible reasonable date. Japan, alone among the states of the Far East, presently holds the potential of offsetting and frustrating the Communist drive to dominate Asia. Japan's industrial capacity and her military potentials loom large as assets to withstand the aggressive onslaughts of Communist China.

As in the case of an Austrian peace treaty, Russia with her legalistic bickerings is playing the part of an obstructionist. Russia does not want any Japanese treaty; she does not want any revival of an economically and militarily potent Japanese Nation fostered by democratic principles.

There are many who perhaps have emotional blocs against the United States pushing for the revival and restoration of a recent enemy belligerent. But it would be foolhardy for us to work against our own best interests and the best interests of a stabilized world condition for such a reason.

Because of the predominant role we played in the Pacific War, we have the right to call the turn on the Japanese Peace Treaty; and if Russia wants to play dog in the manger, that is her privilege. Everything we can do should be done to hasten the day when Japan is a sovereign democratic nation so that her strength may be joined in the fight of the free world to turn back communism.

If these things were accomplished in Europe and in Asia the complexion of the world picture would be altered materially. We would come to look differently at our own manpower requirements and needs if all our efforts were exerted to get everybody on our team that wants to be there, and should be there.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am wondering whether the Senator from South Carolina has given any consideration to the possibility of a few allies behind the iron curtain. It seems to me that we are locking horns with a very unorthodox type of attack. The Communist imperialism has used with great success fear propaganda warfare, economic warfare, political warfare, and actual military warfare. It has used with some success in some parts of the world saboteurs and agents within our country and in many of the other countries of the world. The people of Poland have a great passion for national independence. The history of Poland is that of a great people desiring with fervor and emotion their independence. There are also the people of Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria. I would also include that former great democracy, Czechoslovakia. It appears to me that we should be practicing at this stage of world history what we practiced during World War II when we had the OSS and when we had our agents going behind enemy lines. They were in Yugoslavia and in Czechoslovakia, stirring up the people against the Nazi oppressor.

Is there any reason in the world why we should not be able to bring into our fold untold millions of people who would be anxious to work for the cause of human freedom if we but had contact with them? Possibly we do have such contact with them; I do not know. There are some things which we are not privileged to know. But it appears sensible not only to think in terms of Western Europe and of the friends we have in the Philippine Islands, but let us think of the peoples who over the centuries have fought for freedom—the Poles, the Czechoslovakians, the Bulgarians—who are ruled by a handful of Communist political leaders.

I think it is safe to say that in Czechoslovakia 90 percent of the people are anti-Communist. We should not lose touch with them.

I wanted to bring this thought to the Senator's attention because I pretty much agree with what he is saying, but I want us not only to have our own strength for combating Soviet imperialism, but I should like to remind the Senator, in all friendliness, that there are forces within the Communist Empire who are ready to fight for freedom.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I sincerely thank the Senator for Minnesota for his contribution. There are, it is true, millions of persons back of the iron curtain and in the satellite nations who are only waiting to be given an opportunity to shake off their shackles. There is no question in my mind about that. I think America could spend more in the field of propaganda, as we may call it for want of a better term, to sell the truth as to what is taking place in America and letting those people know what a democratic nation stands for and what privileges we have here.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Today, February 12, marks the birthday of a great American who has gone down in history for many brilliant accomplishments, one of which was his emancipation proclamation. Does it not appear to be a wise and prudent policy on the part of our Government that we make to the world not only an expression of friendship, as was suggested by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] recently in a resolution, in which I joined, expressing friendship for the Russian people, a friendship which I am sure we have for them, but would it not seem a wise and prudent policy to announce through the Congress of the United States, the people's representatives in this country, a sort of emancipation proclamation for all enslaved peoples?

I think the people of Poland are a little bit worried about our containing policy. They think we are going to let them go by the board. I am against the containment idea, and I want the Senator to know that that is my position. I think containment is essentially a negative program. I believe we should be thinking about ways in which we may liberate people.

I can think of no better day than February 12, 1951, to say to people who have been enslaved by Communist hypocrisy and defeat that they are not forgotten souls; that, actually, they are very precious on the agenda of human liberty, and that we are interested in their salvation and in helping them in the process of liberation. Just as we need the armies of France—and the Senator has mentioned the armies of Spain and Greece, and I concede we need those armies in our military program—so do we need to breathe the continuous hope into the hearts and minds of all peoples behind the iron curtain to let them know that we are just as much concerned about their liberty and freedom as we are concerned about the liberty and freedom of France, England, and Western Germany. The only difference is that Poland has already been assaulted; she has been partially consumed by the Communist fire. We should remind those good souls—and they are our friends—that they are not forgotten, that they may temporarily be enslaved, but they are going to have their hour of emancipation, and that this Nation, dedicated to emancipation, is going to try to help them in every possible way.

I wish the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the great leaders of the Senate and of the House would say again and again, every day in the week, to the peoples of the world that we are not only interested in saving what we have but we are interested in the welfare of all peoples and desire to help them liberate themselves from the masters who would grind them into the dirt and into deprivation and misery.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to tell the Senator from Minnesota that I shall touch on that point as I proceed with my speech. I believe we should let the countries which are satellites of Russia know that we are interested in them and that the reason we are not helping them at this time is because we cannot reach them in our efforts to help them. That is our problem in spreading the gospel to them and letting them know about our American way of life.

Although much of the world is tired, disillusioned, and cynical, yet freedom still remains the greatest attraction to man, and with our leadership and support much can be made of situations which, as I said before, all too many people are too ready to write off as liabilities.

We have good reason to believe, for instance, that despite the apparent ironclad Soviet rule of the satellite states there are strong underground movements which await only the day when the signal is given for them to throw off their wraps and enter the fight for freedom. And the same thing applies inside Russia where a small Communist elite impose their regime of organized inequality on the millions of exploited Russians.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from South Carolina on his observations. I did not know that he would bring out that point. He has surely thought far beyond what I have thought on this issue. I wish only to add one idea. Perhaps the Senator from South Carolina will have something further to say about it.

According to newspaper reports, some of the Communist leaders in European countries were trained in Moscow in the principles of communism. Years ago they attended special training courses in Moscow. That is particularly true of such leaders as Togliatti, in Italy, and Gottwald, in Czechoslovakia, as well as of many other Communist leaders. They were trained at Moscow in the techniques of communism. It appears to me, Mr. President, that it would make good sense and that it would border on reasonableness, for the Government of the United States to try to smuggle from behind the iron curtain some of the key democratic leaders and to train them in all the lines they need training for reestablishing free rule in countries behind the iron curtain as well as to feed to them supplies, money, and every conceivable instrument that would be useful to their liberation.

Instead of our always worrying about what the Communists are trying to do to us, I should like to have the Communists behind the iron curtain, in Russia, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, worrying about what we are trying to do to them. I should like to have them wonder whether we could launch counterespionage and counterattacks which would be successful. I think we have been a little weak in that respect. I do not know why. I do not think we have put sufficient emphasis on the philosophy of a counterattack, of trying to get behind the iron curtain and engaging in guerrilla warfare, whether it be political, economic, or diplomatic. We have not done enough along that line. I hope the Senator will touch on the point further along in his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

Probably not the least deterrent to the Politburo's go-ahead for an all-out war is the grim prospect of policing Europe to the English Channel, in the event Soviet arms were initially successful. This they know might well be the wheel on which the Soviet rule would be broken as their far-flung occupation faced the terrors of not one, but many underground armies.

Let us not fall into the error that Western Europe's potentialities are spent. There on the continent which nurtured western civilization and gave to the world its brightest periods in man's history are vast physical resources, great reservoirs of human skill, fires of human spirit. All can be made to serve the cause of liberty once again.

We can and must understand, however, that Europe's people have been through one agony after another. Communities have been pounded into rubble, economies wrecked, human weariness grown to the point of despondency. There is dullness and despair to be found in some places, cynicism and wretchedness, but beneath all this is the spring of hope and aspiration that can never be choked off while life remains.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator spoke of despair and rubble. Has the Senator been in Europe recently?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I have been there, but not recently.

Mr. LANGER. How long ago was the Senator in Europe?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Not since immediately after the First World War.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator speaks of rubble and despair. There is not much of it today. Some of the countries of Western Europe are in better shape than the United States. I was there only a few months ago. Denmark and other countries are in better shape than the United States. We have 10,000,000 families who are living on $2,000 a year.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Senator will remember that Germany has been laid low.

Mr. LANGER. Germany has been laid low. I visited Germany. Did the Senator from South Carolina read the report which was made recently by the distinguished Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. They are building back fast. There is no question about it.

Mr. LANGER. I merely wondered how much of the despair which the Senator has mentioned he knows to exist from his own experience.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. At the outset I referred to the number of divisions the Russians have. It would be well, I believe, before we lead ourselves into miscalculations to understand that a Soviet division is not so large as an American division. The Russian division has approximately 10,000 men, whereas ours run from about 17,000 to 18,000. It can be seen at once that speaking purely in terms of divisions, comparatively, we may ascribe to the Soviets more armed and trained manpower than they actually possess.

Again for sake of guidance, and not in any way to minimize the threat that confronts the West from the Soviets, we may be generally safe in asserting that the Soviet soldiery may be counted upon to be more effective in defending the homeland than in purely offensive action. All of this should figure in our reckonings.

By the same token we cannot ignore the comparative strength of Communist and democratic forces in the air and on the sea. In strategic air power we have the decided edge, and this, of course, would be the instrumentality through which either side would deliver the A-bomb. On the other hand, in numbers, if not in quality of aircraft, the Soviets have the advantage in tactical air power, although we can do much to whittle down the disparity if we push along quickly in our plane-procurement program. On the seas, we are very much out front, especially in surface craft; our advantage is encouragingly marked when we consider the total naval strength of the free world powers. We are adding to this, too, and emphasis is being put upon improved undersea craft.

What I am saying is that there is no need or sense for us to be intimidated into adopting any course which runs contrary to our national conscience or our national interest.

We have what it takes to prevent any power from winning a modern war, and if we proceed with our mobilization program without any undue delays we should shortly be at a point of actualized power where it would be foolhardy for any nation or combine of nations to launch a war.

I feel that one of the chief dangers we must avoid is that of falling into rigid and unimaginative planning on the international scene. Some of our people, with the very best of intentions, have brought themselves around to a mental attitude of "It's all this way, or else." I am of the coviction that no one has a corner on just what is best for the world. Frequently when I am about to cast my vote in the Senate I honestly do not know whether I am voting correctly. In such cases I only ask God to guide and direct me in my vote. As a matter of fact, the whole international situation is in a condition of fluidity and change. We have the task, through our intelligence, of keeping alert to every possible alteration of fact and attitude in the world, and playing it accordingly. No arm is more important than accurate intelligence. We must insist on adequate, competent intelligence service. Only through such media can we steer the right, safe course.

It is of vital and primary importance that we know at the earliest possible date of any weak spots that may be developing within the Soviet orbit of power. How about conditions inside the iron curtain? What about the reports that the Ukraine may be a source of internal trouble for Stalin? We must find out.

In the same way, we must take every step to insure putting our story across to the Soviet world. We know that in the open, the Communist way, with its phony doctrines of equalization, with its special privileges for the elite, with its organized techniques to prevent a free press and free assembly, with its terror apparatus and secret police, cannot stand the competition of a free society. The more we can let the captive peoples of the world know about the real America the faster we can crack the barriers which are maliciously maintained to keep the whole world divided.

Words are weapons, and propaganda with us must be a major instrument of national policy, just as it is with the Soviets.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I am very much interested in what the Senator had to say about Saigon and Burma and some of the other countries. Does not the Senator think it is more important to clean up the slums in the city of Washington within two or three or four blocks of the Capitol than to send money over to Saigon or Burma?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I do not believe the Senator heard me say anything about Burma or Saigon.

Mr. LANGER. I think the Senator mentioned Saigon.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I am sure the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LANGER. What country was it?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I was speaking of other countries. The Senator knows my position as to spending American money abroad. I have never been in favor of spending too much money under the Marshall plan.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator agrees with me that it is more important to remedy slum conditions in Washington, does he not?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I am in favor of dealing with the slums at home. I am in favor of taking care of the home front. I think we should take care of that at the same time when we are looking after the world situation.

In recent months we have been showing considerable improvement in our informational effort, and there are present signs that in the days ahead even more fruitful results will be forthcoming from this source. For too long a time we have been too modest, backward, and subjective about telling the American story to the world. We have a moral arsenal in the saga of this great Republic, and it behooves us to make the most of it.

Certainly we come before the world with clean hands. Our performance during the Berlin airlift was a lesson in humaneness and heroic endeavor that ranks high in the history of the world. True to our promise, we gave the Philippines their independence. The MacArthur stewardship of Japan is something without precedent in history. I wonder how many of us have paused to ponder that Japan, only recently our bitter enemy has been so won to our side that when the Korean invasion by Communist aggressors was launched last June, General MacArthur could virtually strip Japan of all our military forces, dispatch them to the Korean front, and be secure in the knowledge that the Japanese would make no overt move to profit by the situation. Yes, we have a moving story to tell through the Voice of America.

My approach to this whole question of what is best for America and the democratic world in this troublesome period is one of critical constructiveness. I believe I have thrown some light on several areas in which we may have greater sources of strength.

Now one of the things which have caused me a great deal of concern is manpower policy. I know there are many horns to this dilemma. As we proceed in this mobilization it behooves us to keep before us the fact that there are limits to our manpower, just as we should not forget that the battlefield is only the extension of the home front. While providing for adequate armed forces, we also must not disrupt the national work force to the point where production goals will not be met; again it is important to our Nation's future that we take steps to assure our educational institutions that they will not be depleted, and the country thus denuded of that leadership so essential to our national progress.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Would the Senator mind repeating what he said about Berlin? I did not quite catch his statement. Did he say we did a good job in Berlin?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I said we did a good job with the airlift in Berlin.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator certainly would not say we did a good job when we gave all the territory around Berlin to the Russians, and have to ask the Russians, "Won't you please let us bring some foodstuff into the city?"

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I believe the Senator was out of the Chamber when I was speaking a few moments ago. I think there should be some peace terms arranged for Western Germany as soon as possible.

Mr. LANGER. Did the Senator see the poll taken by John McCloy, as published in the Wall Street Journal, which indicated that only 5 percent of the Germans would volunteer and only 10 percent would fight if they were drafted. That appeared in the Wall Street Journal of January 19.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Such a condition will exist until they are giving more privileges at home. I think we should give the people in Western Germany greater privileges.

Mr. LANGER. What privileges would the Senator give the people of Western Germany?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I would not have done what was done to the people of Western Germany or Eastern Germany. I would not have taken the machinery from their factories and used it somewhere else.

Mr. LANGER. Does the Senator know who is to blame? Is it not a fact that Russia so completely controls Berlin and Vienna that the Americans who helped capture those places cannot enter them?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. As the Senator knows that is a long story. He knows it would take me several hours to go into the details, and explain what took place and what did not take place in regard to why the Russians are where they are today.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield that I may ask a question of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Has the Senator from North Dakota studied the history of the fighting around Berlin; has he counted the American losses which would have been sustained had we gone ahead ourselves and attempted to capture Berlin; and has he studied the situation as it developed afterward, when we permitted the Russians to capture Berlin in order to save the lives and prevent the suffering of American boys?

Mr. LANGER. Is the Senator addressing the question to me?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I made a complete study of it. Not only that, but I went to Germany to investigate. I found there that the German population took off their white shirts, got on the roofs, and waved their shirts, and wanted the Americans to come in because America was a much better friend of the German people than were the Russians. What did we find the condition finally to be? We found an agreement under which the Russians completely surrounded the area of Berlin and the area of Vienna. My understanding is that the Ambassador, the man who committed suicide, John Winant, was not blamed, that it was a matter of carelessness that a corridor was not left so that the Americans could go into the city of Vienna and into the city of Berlin.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from North Dakota was in that area as soon as was the present speaker, and realized that the Russians would overrun Berlin before VE-day. I agree with the distinguished Senator from North Dakota that the Germans would have welcomed the Americans, and would have welcomed an American occupation of East Germany. I talked with East Germans, with Lithuanians, with Letts, and with others about it. But, unfortunately, a situation had arisen in which armies had advanced to definite lines. It would have meant an immediate joining of hostilities between Russia and the United States at that time.

I may say to the Senator from North Dakota that I hesitate to blame anything on John Winant. To my mind he was one of the best ambassadors I met in all the European theater. At this time I want to pay tribute to him because, when I talked to him in London in 1945, he appeared to be the only one who fully realized the Russian menace. I now think his unfortunate suicide was based upon his realization of the menace we faced from Russia. I say that because, as it seemed to me, he was the only American diplomat in the European area who knew what was going on inside Russia. He knew the Russian system as operated by the Politburo. I believe his realization of that menace was the reason why he took his own life. He was in England at the time, and I do not think he could have resolved the situation. I think the matter was probably settled—and I hate to blame anybody for it—in the United States. I want to protect the memory of John Winant because I had the highest respect for him, I regarded him as a great American, a great diplomat, and a great patriot, and I still do. I wished to make that statement for the benefit of the Senator from North Dakota. Incidentally, Mr. Winant was not a constituent of mine and never had been.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Can the distinguished Senator from West Virginia tell us who was to blame for the fact that Russia completely surrounded Berlin and Vienna so that Americans could not see and visit the countries they helped to liberate? I may say that my distinguished colleague from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] was one of the men who fought over in Europe in World War II. The Russians took for themselves all the country around Vienna, including Salzburg and Linz. The Senator from New Jersey was High Commissioner there. One day he received an order that, in spite of the fact that many of our boys had been killed in conquering that territory, the American Army must march back some 200 miles, and it did so. Does the Senator know who is to blame for that?

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator from North Dakota is now jumping from the Berlin area to the Austrian area. I was talking about the Berlin area. I think the Senator from North Dakota will find that the Russian troops had completely overrun and surrounded the Berlin area, and that we had to accept what we could in the Berlin area.

As to the Austrian area, let me say this: A man by the name of Eli Perkins, a very fine Baptist preacher of the city of New York, once said—and I think the people of the United States of America would do well to heed the statement Eli Perkins made—"If our foresight was even one-fourth as good as our hindsight we would all be rich." A certain situation existed. In the face of that situation the men on the ground had to decide what to do. Whether that decision had to be made by our State Department or generals in our Army, I do not know. I do not want to place the blame on a man who, through, let us say, a complete lack of foresight, failed to understand what the result of the decision would be. We, with our much better hindsight, can understand what should have been done. I hesitate to place the blame.

The Senator from North Dakota sometimes defends lost causes, and I know that predecessors in the Senate of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] defended lost causes. I know that our foresight sometimes is not so good as the hindsight of our grandchildren or even of our children. So let us not make general condemnation because of something which was done based on lack of foresight. That, I should say, it water over the dam. Let us see what can be done to get around the situation which has come about, and let us, with our good hindsight, correct the mistakes which may have been due to lack of foresight. Let us not, however, jump on a man of the greatness of John Winant and blame him for all that took place.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for an observation?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from New York for an observation.

Mr. LEHMAN. A few days ago I made substantially the same statement the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has made today, that our hindsight is likely to be much clearer than our foresight. But there are two things aside from that which seem very plain to me. In the first place John Winant was an intimate friend of mine. I saw him constantly during the war, because, as the Senator from North Dakota knows, during the period I was head of UNRRA I visited England and other areas of Europe frequently. He never made a statement to me such as has been ascribed to him. As a matter of fact I saw and spoke to him in New York the day before he killed himself. There was no indication of the correctness of the statement which has been ascribed to him.

Furthermore, let me say that we hear a great deal about the wisdom of what was done at Yalta; about a sick President being fooled. I maintain that the decisions made at Yalta were as sound, in view of the circumstances existing at that time, as they could possibly have been made. We were at that time preparing to invade Japan. We had great numbers of men in the Philippines poised to invade Japan. We knew that without Russian help the loss of lives of our fighting men would be staggering. We were not sure of Russia at that time. We were not sure that they were not going to make a separate peace with Germany. We felt it necessary to keep them as our allies ready to join us and fight our battles with us side by side as comrades.

As the Senator from West Virginia says, it is very easy now to be critical, 6 years afterward, in the light of developments which nobody could have foreseen. I am tired of that sort of talk, and I say that not in derogation of my esteemed friend from North Dakota, for he is not the only one who is indulging in it. Some persons less sincere than he, are making statements of that kind, I believe for political purposes, to tear down the memory and the record of the greatest American in my time, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. I say that the judgments made at that time were sound in the light of what was known and what was believed at that time. It ill behooves any one now to seek to destroy the memory and the deeds and the acts of a great man.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield for a brief statement.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I may suggest to my distinguished friend from New York that sometime when he has the opportunity—I know he is a busy man—he read a book entitled "The Mistakes of the War," written by Hanson Baldwin, the military expert of the New York Times, a man who is not in politics. No one who reads in that book the record of the mistakes of the war, as set forth by this distinguished military expert, can possibly believe as does my friend the Senator from New York.

Returning to the question of Berlin and Vienna, not even the most uneducated farmer, whether he lives in Missouri, New York, West Virginia, or North Dakota, would buy a piece of land, 40 acres completely surrounded and inside of a section of land, and fail to reserve the right of the use of a road to get to his piece of surrounded land. Yet we did that with respect to Berlin. We did it again with respect to Vienna. When an American wants to go to Berlin or to Vienna he must ask of the Russians, "Will you please let me go to Berlin or to Vienna."

Perhaps hindsight is better than foresight. But when one mistake after another is made, I submit that criticism is justified. I think the only way one can learn is from studying mistakes.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield, but this is the last time I shall yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that I hope I do not misquote Ambassador Winant. I know, however, that Amabassador Winant was troubled and worried about the future. I know that he knew the inside of Russia.

Let me say, further, that when reference is made to a case in which allies suddenly declare war upon allies—which is exactly what the Senator from North Dakota said—we should recall that at that time we were in the middle of a war in Europe, and we had a war going on in Asia, and VJ-day had not then occurred. I happen to know something about the conditions which existed at that time, for I was in Europe before VJ-day, and spent some time there when some of these things were occurring. Possibly we did allow the Russians to overrun a part of Germany, but they did so at the cost of a tremendous loss of life to themselves, and that meant a tremendous saving of life to our forces.

So, Mr. President, although I believe in criticism, if it is constructive, particularly when it occurs after the act, yet, of course, it does no good to advise a man that he made a mistake in getting married, for example, although it is really worth while to give him advice on that subject before he is married. Possibly the same is true, as applied to women, in more cases than as applied to men.

However, in this case the United States was "married" to an alliance, without which the war could not have been won. All of us must realize that.

Mr. President, all too often we forget that fact when we indulge in criticism. At that time we had an alliance. At that time we had to work as allies. At that time representations were being made even by the great Eric Johnston and by many others who had returned to this country from visits abroad, in offering all sorts of trading propositions with Russia. I am familiar with some of them, because I attended a number of meetings, and heard those propositions stated. Many of those gentlemen had far more trading experience, I may say to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota than had the present speaker, and I think they had a little better trading experience than has the senior Senator from North Dakota. Many of those gentlemen were somewhat inclined to recommend that we accept those trading propositions, as the Senator will recall if he happens to remember the speeches made by Eric Johnston. Of course, I think he is a very honorable gentleman. In this connection let me also refer to the head of the War Production Board, another very honorable gentleman. I think all of them were "taken in."

Mr. President, those are some of the things we must consider in contemplating this entire matter. We must not condemn a man like John Winant, and certainly we must not condemn the man who carried us from the abyss of despair, where we were at that time, to the brink of victory. They should not be condemned.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, if my distinguished friend from West Virginia will remain in the Chamber until the distinguished Senator from South Carolina has concluded his remarks, I shall answer him.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, when the distinguished Senators began their colloquy a few moments ago, and referred to the mistakes which were made and why they were made, I had been discussing the manpower problem now facing us. I intend to point out some of the mistakes which probably were made.

I hope that our foresight this time will be a little better than our foresight was before, and I hope we shall profit by our mistakes. Our highest officials make mistakes, of course; but sometimes they make mistakes under circumstances and conditions which are just a little different from those existing at the present time. For that reason we cannot always criticize those officials for making such mistakes, for probably they did what they thought best under the circumstances then existing. If my memory serves me correctly, I did not hear many Senators criticize what was occurring when the United States Army stopped its fighting and let the Russians continue fighting. I did not receive many letters from my constituents at home expressing opposition to what America was doing at that time. Neither did I hear any Senator speak in this Chamber or any Member of the House speak in the House of Representatives in condemnation of what was occurring then.

However, now, after many years have passed, and when conditions have changed, our hindsight is better than our foresight was on those occasions. Then it is that I hear the prophets of today begin to criticize and tell what we should have done many years ago. That is what is occurring in America today.

Mr. President, we should study our history, realize the mistakes we made in the past, and try to learn how to meet the situations which will arise in the days to come.

A few minutes ago I was speaking of the manpower situation now existing, and of its seriousness. One of the things I would like to see would be an efficient integration, at the very top level, of all the various policies relating to manpower for the Armed Forces, for the needs of the civilian population, and for the industrial-production program. I have in mind the lessons of the last war when only too often bickering and contradictory courses marked the home front, as the various agencies concerned with advancing the war effort created conflicts which were wasteful and costly in the end.

All of us know that in the last war, due to placement of war-production facilities, many communities were literally choked because they did not have sufficient houses, transportation, or community facilities to handle the load which was placed upon them. At the same time there were many other communities which fought in vain for war plants. As a result, in one place after another official bottlenecks of congestion were created, producing adverse economic, social, and moral results. What did it avail a father to make a high wage if he had to live in a distant city, pay wartime living scales, be separated from his family, and in the end have scant send-home pay? Homes divided and homes broken were too often the result. Anyone versed in industrial production will tell us that labor is vastly more efficient when employed at home than when it is compelled to become migratory.

One of the first ways in which we can meet the increasing demands upon our national manpower resources is to insist upon the adoption and execution of production policies which will make the utmost use of the available manpower pools of the country. This factor should be a guiding principle in the designation of new industrial facilities, and should be a prime consideration in the placement of war contracts. When all such surplus-manpower regions have been utilized to their capacity, it will be time to get on with the job of consulting the possibilities of using male and female workers in the upper age brackets.

On the educational front we have a serious situation. All of us have been disturbed, I know, by the pictures and news stories of the long lines of college students who in recent days have been visiting recruiting centers, endeavoring to sign up in the armed services. Our patriotic youth has been rather hard put to know what to do. It is mightily encouraging to find them ready in such large numbers to volunteer. On the other hand, what of the future of our Nation if we are not to have educated leaders for the professions and the sciences and in other walks of life?

All of us, I know, welcomed the announcement, as I did, by Defense Secretary Marshall, the other day, of a basic new policy for enlistment in the Armed Forces by college students. According to Secretary Marshall, the policy is intended to prevent the waste to the Nation and the damage to the educational system that is involved in having young men leave school in mid-term because they desire to enlist in the service of their choice before they are called for preinduction physical examination by their local draft boards. As we know, under the old rule, no branch of the armed services would accept a voluntary enlistment after a man had received notice to report for his preinduction physical examination.

Under provisions of the new policy, it is provided that students enrolled in colleges or universities, and thus automatically entitled to deferment for the school year in which they receive their induction notice, shall, to the extent of available openings in each service, be allowed to enlist in the service of their choice at any time in the 2 months immediately preceding the final month of their school year. As in the past, each service would accept enlistments only to the extent that places were open for those who desired to enlist. The new policy provides that a young man called by selective service during the academic year would continue his studies and still retain the right to designate his choice of service. Services accepting enlistments during this 2-month period would not call the students to duty until they had finished their school year.

In the opinion of General Marshall, the new rules will prove of benefit to the students, the colleges, and the national defense effort. In making the announcement, he put emphasis on the importance of the Nation's maintaining a vigorous educational system and on eliminating the unsettled conditions which have developed throughout the country in college circles as a result of enlistments by men who wanted to enlist before they received their selective-service calls.

I was very much pleased, too, to see General Marshall at the same time urging college students enrolled in the Army, Navy, or Air Force Reserve Officers' Training Corps to make every effort to complete their courses as a patriotic duty. As General Marshall stated, ROTC is a fundamental element in all Departments of Defense planning for expansion and maintenance of the Armed Forces. Because of this, the Selective Service Act defers from induction under its provisions during all their college years selected ROTC students who sign agreements to accept commissions and to serve a minimum of 2 years on active duty in the military service for which they are being trained. All ROTC students who successfully fulfill the training and physical requirements are assured of commissions in the Regular or Reserve components of the Armed Forces.

All this is very important to America's security. Our whole policy is one for the maintenance of peace. If, however, we are forced into a global war, it probably wil be one of long duration, and will place a continuing emphasis on the need of trained military leadership. On the other hand, if we are to go on through a long period of tension, in a twilight zone, it becomes doubly important that we get on with the education of our young people, and at the same time give as large a number of them as possible military training. To this end, the ROTC programs rank high on our list of national requirements. I should like to see every educational institution in the country which is capable of maintaining an ROTC program in any or several of the armed services be assigned such programs to their capacity. Money spent in this way, I believe, would be a very sound national investment.

Sound over-all strategy—that is the need of the hour; strategy in all aspects and elements of our democratic life. We know that the enemies of democracy are strong, but they are not invincible. In a contest between a materialistic Godless atheism, which seeks to enslave the world, and a democratic order, founded on man's belief in God, democratic man will emerge the victor. The United States has never flinched in the face of a threat or a challenge, and we have no intention of abdicating before our responsibilities and opportunities now.

So I say, let us bring a calm and resolute frame of mind to the problems which need our attention, ever cognizant of the fact that each of us, as a Member of the Congress, has the right to his own views; being mindful of the fact that, although we may differ, none has a monopoly on patriotism, virtue, or wisdom. What needs to be done, we can do with good spirit, through constructive compromise, and in ways that will unite all our people, as America, a strong champion of freedom and justice, goes forward in confidence to achieve its destiny.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENNINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. I am very much interested in the concluding remarks of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, stressing the right of every individual to his own views, and so forth. Will the Senator not say that the Republican Party has kept this country out of war whenever it was in power, and that every time we have become involved in a war a Democratic administration has been in power.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. In reply, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota how any administration could have kept us out of World War II, after the attack upon Pearl Harbor? Would the Republican Party, which is the Senator's party, have kept us out of war, following that attack? Will the Senator from North Dakota answer that question?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; I will answer it. Let me tell my good friend that, if there had been a Republican administration, there would never have been a Pearl Harbor attack. Let me tell the Senator further——

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. LANGER. The Senator has asked me a question, and I want to answer it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Go ahead. I tell the Senator further that if——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, he yielded to me.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yielded for a question.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator asked me a question, and I should like to answer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has yielded for a question only.

Mr. LANGER. I may say further that we would never have had World War I, if we had followed the advice of that great Democratic Secretary of State, William Jennings Bryan, who resigned rather than become a party to it. He was a great Democrat who came from the Middle Northwest.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Can the Senator from North Dakota tell us how many Members of Congress voted against World War I?

Mr. LANGER. I may say to my distinguished friend that former Senator Gronna, of North Dakota, was one of the so-called "willful 12", who stood here and fought with former Senator La Follette to keep us out of war. He fought until he almost dropped. Let me say further——

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. May I inquire of the Senator whether former Senator La Follette was at that time a Republican, a Democrat, or a Progressive? What was he?

Mr. LANGER. He was a Republican, I am happy to say. I may say further that Woodrow Wilson, as a candidate, carried the United States on the slogan, "I will keep you out of war." He carried my State on that slogan, although it was a Republican State. Woodrow Wilson carried it because he promised absolutely to keep us out of war. That was during the campaign in the fall of 1916, and within a few months, and on April 6, 1917, we were in the war.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I wonder if the Senator from North Dakota recalls the slogan "Remember the Maine," which occurred during the administration of William McKinley, as I well remember it, and also the slogan "Remember Pearl Harbor."

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

FARM PRICES AND THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO THE PRICE-CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, recently the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Charles Brannan, made a statement concerning farm prices and their relationship to the price-control program. It appears to me that the Secretary of Agriculture has brought to the attention of the people some very significant facts concerning farm income, farm prices, and their relationship to the price, wage, and profit picture. I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Mr. Brannan be printed in the body of the RECORD, and I wish to invite particular attention to his concluding remarks, as follows:

Parity is the fairest available measure of equitable prices for agricultural products.

Parity never increases until after prices of goods bought by farmers have increased, and then only by enough to balance the increases in prices and cost rates paid by farmers. When prices paid by farmers go down, parity goes down.

So, Mr. President, I might say that if there is a desire for lower prices, that desire can be met by adjusting what is called parity; in other words, the relationship of things sold to the relationship of things purchased.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire statement by the Secretary of Agriculture be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM PRICES IN THE PRICE-CONTROL PICTURE

A number of recent public statements have created the impression that agricultural commodity prices are unreasonably or disproportionately high in relation to prices of other consumer goods or to wages or to the farmer's costs. This impression is not warranted by the facts.

Other statements indicate that food prices are exempted from price control. This also is not true. On the contrary, food products now included in the freeze order represent about 40 percent of the total food cost in the BLS consumers' price index.

Still other statements seek to show that farmers have been given special or privileged treatment in the laws and regulations providing for inflation control. Again, this is not true.

The purpose of this statement is not to deny that prices of some foods and farm commodities have substantially increased but rather to show where they really stand in our economy of general prosperity and full employment.

1. HOW HIGH ARE FARM PRICES?

It is true, of course, that prices received by farmers for many commodities have risen in recent months and are now high in relation to their own history. But the same is true of most other raw and finished goods. For example, since the Korean outbreak, tin has gone up more than 138 percent, aluminum over 78 percent, lead nearly 50 percent, chemicals about 27 percent, and textiles 32 percent. In the same period prices received by farmers have advanced 21 percent.

Prices received by farmers have still not reached their previous record level, while farmers' costs have gone on up to new record heights. On the other hand, corporate profits, wages, and average personal incomes are setting new records.

Here are major facts about farm commodity prices and farm income which should be considered in the present situation:

(A) Most prices of farm commodities to the producer are below parity—the statutory measure of fair relationship between prices received by farmers and prices paid by farmers. Some are above parity—meats in particular—but these are now under the same type of control that applies to all other prices.

Much has been made of the fact that the farm commodities selling below parity are free to rise and thus increase the cost of living before becoming subject to control. But if all farm commodities now below parity should reach the parity level, consumer food costs would rise less than 5 percent, and this would mean less than a 2-percent rise in the over-all cost of living.

Moreover, it is extremely unlikely that such a rise will occur. Prices of potatoes and oranges represent about a third of that 5-percent difference; those prices have been about 50 percent of parity and there are no current indications of substantial rises; also, canned fruits and vegetables now in the warehouses and grocery stores are from last year's crop, already sold by the farmer; thus, there is no farm price of those commodities to be increased.

(B) Food prices have risen less than prices of some other commodity groups in the BLS consumer price index. From June to December food went up 5.3 percent, while clothing rose 6.2 percent and house furnishings rose 10.6 percent.

Consumers' price index: Cost of goods purchased by wage earners and low-salaried workers in large cities, United States (1935–39=100)[1]

	June 1950	December 1950	Percentage change from June 1950 to December 1950
All items	170.2	178.4	+4.8
Food	204.6	215.4	+5.3
Apparel	185.0	196.4	+6.2
Rent	123.9	125.8	+1.5
Fuel, etc	138.9	144.1	+3.7
House furnishings	185.2	204.8	+10.6
Miscellaneous	155.3	162.0	+4.3

[1] Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Compiled from Retail Price, Bureau of Labor Statistics.

As shown by the table above, rents were relatively stable. Exclude rents from the computation and it will be seen that the other items of the index rose approximately the same as food.

(C) The average of all farm commodity prices is just now overcoming the drop it took in 1948 and 1949. The drop in farm prices averaged 24 percent, while nonfarm prices and wages were either dropping very little or continuing upward.

As of January 15, prices received by farmers were still 2 percent below the January 1948 peak. While receiving lower prices, farmers had to continue paying high prices, with the result that their net realized income went down 3 years in a row.

Net income realized by farm operators dropped from almost $18,000,000,000 in 1947 to about $16,500,000,000 in 1948, about $14,000,000,000 in 1949, and about $13,000,000,000 in 1950. If prices had not risen substantially in the latter part of 1950, farmers' net income for that year would have been further appreciably reduced.

(D) No other major segment of our economy went through such a severe economic setback. In fact, corporate profits after taxes, following a small decline, have gone on up to new records and are now running about 32 percent above the 1947 rate. For 1950 as a whole they were 18 percent above 1947. Wages have gradually risen, and hourly earnings of factory workers in 1950 were 18 percent above the 1947 level.

Corporate profits after taxes amounted to $18,500,000,000 in 1947, went up to $20,900,000,000 in 1948, were at $17,000,000,000 in 1949, and reached a new record peak of $21,900,000,000 in 1950. In the last quarter of 1950, they were running at an annual rate of about $24,500,000,000. Factory wages were $1.24 per hour in 1947, $1.46 in 1950, and for December were $1.54.

(See chart for these and other comparisons.)

It is sometimes said that it is unfair to compare recent trends with levels reached in 1947, the all-time high year for agricultural income. Other comparisons can be made. For example, for the last quarter of 1950 as compared with the prewar period 1935–39, food prices had slightly more than doubled, but consumers' disposable income per capita was more than 2½ times the prewar level. Also, in 1950 income from agriculture was running 2½ times the 1935–39 average, while nonagricultural income was almost 3½ times and corporate profits more than six times 1935–39.

It should also be remembered that until the early part of the recent war, agriculture had not fully recovered from its long depression of the 1920's and early 1930's. Comparisons based upon depression conditions are completely unfair. Comparisons with postwar benchmarks at least measure how the various segments of the economy have been doing recently.

(E) Food is a better bargain for the average person today than in the prewar period. Those people whose incomes have kept up with the average can buy with 19 percent of their disposable income the same diet that required 23 percent of their disposable income in 1935–39. It is true, of course, that persons whose incomes have substantially lagged behind the general rise are at a disadvantage—some seriously. They have a real problem which requires the sympathetic attention of the whole public. However, agricultural commodity prices in general cannot be geared to the needs of the disadvantaged group as long as other prices are left at high levels. The result would be to drive farmers out of business and disrupt production at the time we most need a strong, highly productive agriculture.

(F) Prices of many farm commodities have very little relationship to consumer prices. Several examples give this picture clearly:

The cotton in a shirt now selling for $3.50 to $4 probably did not bring the farmer more than 30 cents.

A 16-cent can of tomatoes represents about 3 cents of gross income to the farmer.

The corn in a can retailing at 19 cents brought less than 2¾ cents to the producer.

Onions which were selling in stores in November for 5.7 cents a pound had been sold by the farmers for a little over 1 cent.

When milk leaves the farm, it immediately goes into a distribution and processing system that almost doubles its price in a few hours.

The wheat in a loaf of bread that sells for 15 to 16 cents brings the farmer only about 2⅔ cents. It is interesting to note that the retail price of bread has gone up 1.7 cents a loaf since June. If this were due entirely to a rise in the price of wheat, it would mean that wheat had gone up $1.12 a bushel. Actually, the farm price of wheat in January was only 16 cents a bushel higher than it was before the Korean outbreak.

Although the farmer is getting a larger share of the consumer's food dollar than a year ago (now about 51 percent) this is still considerably smaller than the share received by the farmer in several recent years. In 1945 and 1946 the farmer's share averaged 54 and 53 percent, respectively. From January of 1943 through September 1948, the farmer's share did not go below 50 percent in any month.

(G) Causes of price rises in agricultural commodities are somewhat different from the causes of price rises in nonfarm commodities generally. Prices of many manufactured items tend to rise because market supplies are being lowered in order to permit increased production of military goods. Most agricultural commodities, on the other hand, are available in record and near-record amounts, but demand is increasing as consumer incomes increase.

These considerations emphasize the importance of abundant production in the job of keeping prices of agricultural commodities at reasonable levels. On the other hand, it should not be taken for granted that agricultural production can be increased enough to meet all of the rising demands.

(H) The public does not ask manufacturers to produce military goods at less than fair returns. On new defense plants, rapid depreciation is permitted in order to reduce tax liability. Under the Defense Production Act, Government agencies encourage financial institutions to lend money to defense producers by guaranteeing the lenders against loss. The Government itself may lend money for the expansion of productive capacity, the development of technological processes, explorations and mining. The Government often makes advance commitments to buy what is produced.

Many agricultural commodities are of such importance that, if necessary for expansion of production, the public (through Government) would undoubtedly make to farmers some of the same concessions and guaranties that it makes to manufacturers and other producers of defense goods. Some such devices might become necessary if agricultural prices were depressed in relation to other prices.

2. ARE FARM PRODUCTS EXEMPTED BY LAW FROM PRICE CONTROL?

No. Prices of all farm commodities are subject to control as soon as they reach a legally specified level.

Important farm commodities were put under price control in the price-wage freeze order issued by the Economic Stabilization Agency, January 26. Among them were the meat animals, wool, cotton, cottonseed, rice, and flue-cured tobacco.

3. HOW DOES THE LAW DEFINE THE LEVEL AT WHICH A CEILING MAY BE PLACED ON AN AGRICULTURAL COMMODITY?

No ceiling may be established below the parity price or the highest price received by producers during the period from May 24 to June 24, 1950. Both levels are subject to adjustment for grade, location, and seasonal differentials. Except in a few unusual situations, those provisions apply generally.

4. UNDER THE LAW, MUST CEILINGS BE HIGH ENOUGH TO PERMIT FAIR MARGINS FOR PROCESSORS?

Yes. The law says, "That in establishing and maintaining ceilings on products resulting from the processing of agricultural commodities, including livestock, a generally fair and equitable margin shall be allowed for such processing."

5. DOES THE LAW SPECIFY THE LOWEST LEVEL AT WHICH CEILINGS MAY BE APPLIED TO WAGES AND TO PRICES OTHER THAN FARM COMMODITY PRICES?

Yes. The standard for both is the May 24–June 24 level, but exceptions are permitted. Prices found to be abnormal in that period can be adjusted to a representative level. Provision is also made for adjustment of hardships and inequities. Controls on wages, salaries, and other compensation must not be "inconsistent with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, or the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, or any other law of the United States, or of any State, the District of Columbia, or any Territory or possession of the United States."

6. IS THE PROHIBITION AGAINST BELOW-PARITY CEILINGS FOR FARM PRODUCTS INCONSISTENT WITH OTHER PRICE AND WAGE PROVISIONS OF THE LAW OR WITH ACCEPTED GOVERNMENTAL PRINCIPLES?

No. The law seeks to achieve certain purposes, including the control of inflation, by means which are fair and equitable. In consequence, its provisions are based upon certain standards contained in previous legislation—minimum standards for wages and working conditions in the field of labor and the parity or fair price measurement for farm products—as well as a general provision for normal or representative prices.

If the old standards of equity were to be abandoned, new legal standards would have to take their place or be improvised by administrators from day to day.

Neither agriculture nor business nor labor nor any other segment can properly be asked to bear controls first, alone, or inequitably. Such action would be neither effective nor fair. All must bear the responsibility together.

Parity is the fairest available measure of equitable prices for agricultural products.

Parity never increases until after prices of goods bought by farmers have increased, and then only by enough to balance the increases in prices and cost rates paid by farmers. When prices paid by farmers go down, parity goes down.

OPA officials, reviewing price-control experience during World War II, concluded in a publication issued in 1947 that "it does not seem possible that anything other than parity could have been adopted by OPA as an administrative method of measuring generally fair and equitable prices for agricultural commodities."

REPAIR OR REPLACEMENT OF KEOKUK LOCKS ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, KEOKUK, IOWA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the President's budget for the coming fiscal year makes no provision for repair or replacement of Keokuk Locks on the Mississippi River, at Keokuk, Iowa. The dam at Keokuk and the locks are in a bad state of repair. A break-down in these facilities would impair or wreck river transportation on the upper Mississippi River. I have urged the Bureau of the Budget to reconsider its decision to delete funds for adequate repair or replacement. I have written to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations pointing out the importance to the national economy and defense of these vital river facilities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a copy of my letter to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and an editorial from the Minneapolis Star of January 26, 1951, entitled "River Transport Faces Bright Future, Unless—"

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 1, 1951.

The Honorable KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Appropriations, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have on a number of occasions directed the attention of your committee to the matter of the rehabilitation of the Keokuk Dam, at Keokuk, Iowa.

I have recently been informed that although the Army Corps of Engineers included a one-million-dollar item in their report to the Bureau of the Budget for the Keokuk Dam, the Bureau of the Budget saw fit to delete that item.

At this time, I would like to bring to your attention some data which I think is pertinent and should certainly receive the fullest consideration of your committee.

Nine-foot depth for navigation on the Mississippi River between the Missouri River and Minneapolis, Minn., a distance of 660 miles, has been available since 1939, but a serious bottleneck still exists at Keokuk, Iowa, about 170 miles above St. Louis, Mo., where the existing lock, built in 1913, is entirely inadequate for needs of present-day traffic. The existing lock is 358 feet by 110 feet, compared to 600-foot by 110-foot locks at other sites, and the 1,200- by 100-foot lock being provided at Chain of Rocks and proposed for new lock No. 19.

After 35 years of service, the old lock shows the effect of age and wear, and many of its mechanical features are nearing or have reached the end of their economic life. Major overhaul of the structure is urgently needed and should be undertaken at once if the new lock is not constructed in the immediate future. Unless such action is taken, the old lock, to a much greater extent than at present, will cause prolonged delays and interruptions to upper Mississippi River traffic. Even with complete overhaul, which could be accomplished only with intolerable interference with traffic for several years, the structure would remain an outmoded lock of short length with slow-operating characteristics, in a system of larger and faster operating locks.

Failure to rebuild the Keokuk lock would very seriously affect the security and economy of the territory adjacent to the Mississippi River, north of St. Louis. In substantiation of this statement, I quote Lt. Col. G. A. Finley, Corps of Engineers, of Rock Island:

"In answer to your request of October 26, 1950, for lock No. 19 traffic data for the 1949 navigation season, the following figures, for commercial tows only, are furnished:

	1948 [1]	1949	1950 [2]
Total tonnage	1,573,410	3,514,072	3,030,920
Average tons per tow	3,140	3,085	3,349
Total number of tows	501	1,139	905
Total number of lockages	1,007	2,195	1,810
Time spent in lockages hours	1,004	1,872	1,582
Time of delays to tows hours	537	1,000	1,000
Average lockage time, per tow hours	2.00	1.64	1.75
Average delay per tow hours	1.07	.88	1.10
Average time to transit lock 19 hours	3.07	2.52	2.85
Average time per lockage hours	1.00	.85	.87

[1] 1948 figures are for June, July, October, and November only, as those were the only months when delays records were maintained. Total tonnage for 1948 season was 3,125,156 tons.

[2] 1950 records for March through September only are included.

The tonnage figures are preliminary, but it is considered that they would be in substantial agreement with the final official figure.

"In explanation of the apparently excessive average lockage time for 1948 season, it is pointed out that work on the discharge valves was carried out during the navigation season, and that the emptying time of the lock is increased about 25 percent when one of the valves is out of operation, as was the case for a considerable part of the 1948 season.

"On the basis of the 1948 season figures, had the proposed new lock been in operation, the 1,139 tows could have been passed in 1,139 lockages, and delays would have been practically eliminated. Since the filling and emptying time for the new lock, including gate operation time, will be about 10 minutes, and if 5 minutes each is allowed for entering and leaving the lock, which will have much better approaches than the existing lock, the lockage time should be approximately 20 minutes if upstream and downstream tows alternate, and 30 minutes if all are from the same direction. For use in estimating time savings, 25 minutes is considered a fair average lockage time. Lockage of 1,139 tows would require 475 hours, a saving of 1,397 hours; these hours, taken with the 1,000 hours of delay time eliminated, make an estimated possible saving of 2,397 towboat hours. Similar figures for the 7 months of the 1950 season extended to a full season indicate possible savings of 1,549 hours in lockage time, plus 1,283 hours of delay, or a total possible saving of 2,832 hours.

"The value of savings in time, estimated (perhaps too conservatively) to be $37.50 per hour for 1948 statistics, must be considerably greater by now, considering the steady increase in horsepower in new towboats and the increased construction, maintenance, and operating costs. We have no detailed information with which to revise our annual charge figures for the boat and barge fleets, but on the basis of a few figures on lay time charges and construction costs of tows now in the petroleum trade, we consider that $60 per hour is not unreasonable. Using $60 per hour for delays in 1949 and 1950, the annual value of delays and cost per ton moved through the Keokuk Lock are shown in the following tabulation:

Tons	3,125,156	3,514,072	3,680,398
Possible savings hours	2,760	2,397	2,832
Savings value	[2] $103,500	$143,820	$169,920
Value per ton	$0.033	$0.041	$0.046

[1] 7 months' figures extended to 9 months.

[2] 4 months' savings figures extended to 9 months at $37.50 an hour.

"Repair maintenance and improvement costs for the Keokuk lock for fiscal years 1949 and 1950 were $94,993.25 and $38,796.26, respectively. Figures for 1949 include $45,560 spent on gate repairs and $15,800 spent on discharge-valve repairs."

When you realize the amount of fuel which comes up the Mississippi River north of Keokuk, Iowa, should it be cut off, we would have difficulty in supplying an area that is further removed from the source of either solid or liquid fuel, and might cause extreme hardships to industries, communities, and the farming area.

I most sincerely urge the Committee on Appropriations to give adequate reconsideration to this vitally important matter.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

[From the Minneapolis Star of January 26, 1951]

RIVER TRANSPORT FACES BRIGHT FUTURE, UNLESS—

Nearly 3,000,000 tons of freight moved on the Mississippi River above Guttenberg, Iowa, in 1950. Most of it was shipped into or out of the Twin Cities. The tonnage is a gain of almost 20 percent over 1949, a gain of 2,000 percent since 1937.

These figures are cited in the annual report of the Upper Mississippi and St. Croix River Improvement Commission, an unpaid official agency of the State of Minnesota, manned by five public-spirited citizens.

River transportation of coal and petroleum products has become much more important to this State than most Minnesotans probably realize. The commission's report says:

"Except for the river, the State would be experiencing fuel and power costs which would definitely injure our economy. Electric rates here are competitive with those near coal mines and power sites largely through low-cost barge transportation. When a serious fuel-oil shortage prevailed three winters ago, it was due to an early closing of water transportation and was relieved when navigation again opened."

Water traffic was particularly valuable to this part of the country during the war, when railroads were overloaded and freight cars wore out faster than new ones were built. With another defense emergency, the same threat of a fuel shortage must be faced.

Based on increases in river traffic in recent years, the time is not far off when 5,000,000 tons will be carried. But Army engineers warn that the river system is only as strong as its weakest link, and the weak link is the Keokuk, Iowa, lock.

When the 9-foot channel on the upper Mississippi was authorized in 1930, locks of 110 feet by 600 feet were agreed upon. A dam at Keokuk, built in 1913, already had a lock 110 feet wide and 365 feet long. Congress said that would have to do.

Keokuk has a lift of 38 feet, much higher than the usual lock on the river. This lift, plus the fact that barge tows must be broken up to get through the lock, slows up traffic at Keokuk. Delays of 6 to 10 hours are frequent.

Plans have been prepared for a 1,200-foot lock. The cost would be about $8,000,000. That's a lot of money and in these times no unnecessary civilian expenditures should be undertaken. But the big role played by upper river traffic indicates that it is necessary to replace an antiquated lock that is near the limit of its capacity.

The Government now has an investment of $170,000,000 in the 9-foot channel. Private industry has invested a quarter of a billion dollars to use the river. More industries are in prospect, unless the Keokuk bottleneck holds traffic near present tonnages.

Even an economy-minded Congress should consider how much a new lock would mean to improving the whole transportation system for a vital part of the Nation.

HISTORY AND SUMMARY OF ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on February 6 the Fraternal Order of Eagles observed its fifty-third anniversary. It is a pleasure for me to bring this fact to the attention of the Senate and to commend that organization and its 1,200,000 American members for its splendid community services. I am proud to be a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles. It is a humanitarian organization; it is a patriotic organization. Dedicated to the four cardinal virtues of liberty, truth, justice, and equality, it has directed its energies in behalf of workmen's compensation, old-age pensions, social security, assistance to the Armed Forces, among many other great services. Its emblem is the national emblem of the United States, the white-crested American eagle, symbol of courage, strength, and hardihood.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement setting forth the history of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, and a summary of its accomplishments.

There being no objection, the statement and summary were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES AND ITS SOCIAL VISION

When the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, a life member of Buffalo (N. Y.) Aerie, signed the Social Security Act on August 14, 1935, he expressed his appreciation for what the Eagles had done.

"I have long observed with satisfaction the sponsorship by the FOE of social justice legislation both in the States and in the Nation. The records for more than a quarter of a century bear witness to the campaigns of education conducted, the literature distributed, and the addresses delivered by your socially minded order. These efforts have borne, and are bearing gratifying results. Our countrymen owe the Eagles much good will for their unselfish services.

"The pen I am presenting the order is a symbol of my approval of the fraternity's vision and courage. May its possession inspire your 600,000 members to rededicate their own efforts and those of the fraternity to the insuring of such economic and political conditions as will bring a greater degree of happiness to our people."

A summary of the social legislation sponsored by the Fraternal Order of Eagles follows:

Eagles sponsored and led the fight for the enactment of the first mothers' pension law in the history of America, the Missouri law.

An Eagle drafted and Eagles supported the first workmen's compensation act passed in any State in the Union, the Wisconsin law.

Eagles led the crusade for State old-age pension laws and the first State pension system, that of Montana, was introduced by an Eagle member legislator and signed by an Eagle governor.

Eagles spent 14 years campaigning for a national social security law and the President who signed the Social Security Act, the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, gave the pen with which he signed the measure to the FOE in recognition of its pioneering leadership.

An Eagle made the first known public plea for the observance of a national Mother's Day and the order adopted the idea as a fraternal observance, long before Mother's Day became a national holiday.

Eagles played an important role in starting America's first Citizenship or I Am an American Day, with Manitowoc, Wis., as the locale of the first Citizenship Day program.

Eagles endorsed the principle of the guaranteed annual wage back in 1930 and are campaigning for a wider acceptance of the "52 pay checks a year" employment guaranty.

Eagles originated the observance of June 20 as Emblem Day, making the adoption of the American bald eagle as the official emblem of our country.

Eagles, at the request of the sponsors of the measures, joined in the fight to secure enactment of the GI bill of rights, as a framework for future veterans' service legislation.

HISTORY OF THE FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES

The Fraternal Order of Eagles today is America's greatest benefit paying fraternity. More than a million members are affiliated with the fraternity that bears the banner of liberty, truth, justice, and equality in almost 1,800 communities in the United States, Canada, Alaska, Hawaii, the Philippines, and Guam. Dedicated to brotherhood, friendship, and helpfulness to their fellow men and their communities, the Eagles have been a potent force for happiness and the enrichment of the lives of its members and all fellow citizens.

Who are Eagles? Eagles are people, your neighbor, the butcher, the grocer, the judge, the lawyer, the businessman, the civic leader. An Eagle may be the President of the United States, for four Eagles have served in the White House. An Eagle may be a celebrated sports figure like Jack Dempsey, or another famous American, like the late Father Flanagan of Boys Town. He may be a member of the Cabinet, or a Congressman. But whether he is known to millions, or only to his family and circle of friends in his home town, an Eagle is drawn into his fraternity by his yearning for sociability, friendliness, and the opportunity to participate in worthy endeavors. In service to others through the Fraternal Order of Eagles, he finds a medium for enhancing the welfare of others, and contributing to his own inner satisfaction and joy.

Founded more than 50 years ago, the Eagles have achieved a noteworthy record in its programs and movements for economic and human betterment. It is a record that is still being written. It includes pioneering for the great social legislation of our time—the National Social Security Act, State old-age pensions, mothers' pensions, and workmen's compensation. The order has paid out millions to its members in sickness and death benefits. Its humanitarian service to all, regardless of race or creed, runs into inestimable totals. And with its benefactions, the Eagles have built up an organization with financial stability and integrity, with net assets exceeding more than a hundred million dollars. Today there are 1,778 aeries in the United States and Canada.

The growth of the Eagles achieved tremendous proportions under Administrative Director Matty Brown, who served as managing organizer from 1944 to 1950. During that period the membership reached more than a million. A total of 595 new aeries were instituted. The organization of ladies auxiliaries attained impetus, with the institution of 360 such units, and doubling of the membership to 92,000. Formation of the Junior Order of Eagles was launched, youth groups, sponsored by subordinate aeries, to provide sports, civic and recreational programs for boys and girls in a movement to build better citizens. Other significant developments included the establishment of an Eagle employee's pension system, the Eagles National Life Insurance Co., the architectural service department, the reserve membership department, and the benefit fund security plan.

THE MEMORIAL FOUNDATION

But undoubtedly most significant of all, the most humanitarian undertaking of many in the history of the order, was the establishment and operation of the Fraternal Order of Eagles Memorial Foundation. The foundation was born out of World War II, the brain child of the then managing organizer Matty Brown, who conceived it as a living memorial to benefit the lives of children whose Eagle fathers had given their lives for their country. The foundation was established through the generous donations of aeries and individual Eagles for philanthropic purposes associated with the order's programs and ideals. The initial work of the foundation is the providing of medical, dental, and other physical welfare services and college educations for the children of Eagle fathers whose lives were lost in World War II. Hundreds of these children are now being aided. As a perpetual fund, with the principal remaining intact, and only investment proceeds used, the foundation will in later years contribute to other worthy causes advancing Eagle ideals.

The Fraternal Order of Eagles was founded on February 6, 1898, by six theatrical men who sauntered over to the tideflats at Seattle and sat on a lumberpile to discuss the formation of a "Seattle order of good things." Little did they realize that their idea of a friendship society would be seized upon with such enthusiasm. The six founders, none of whom are now living—John W. Considine, John Cort, Tom J. Considine, Harry Leavitt, Mose Goldsmith, and Arthur Williams—invited a few more friends the following Sunday to join the new organization. At a meeting the following Sunday at the Bella Union Theater, with the stage of the theater as the lodge room, a constitution was adopted. A short time later the name of the organization was changed to the Fraternal Order of Eagles. New aeries were formed in the region, and the purpose of the order broadened to include serious and significant programs for the general welfare.

THE EARLY DAYS

It is interesting to learn about the early development of the Eagles from the man who was in the best position to tell it, John Cort, one of the founders and the first grand worthy president. Speaking at the first grand aerie convention held at Seattle, May 6-9, Cort said:

"We called our lodges aeries because an eagle's nest is called an aerie," he said. "Shortly after the founding of the order, I went to Spokane, my old home. I talked to some of the boys about our organization, and out of that came Spokane Aerie No. 2. Then a little later, one of us happened to be in Tacoma and talked to some of our friends there. Out of that came Tacoma Aerie No. 3. Someone went to Portland, and we had Portland Aerie No. 4. Someone else went to San Francisco, and so we had San Francisco Aerie No. 5."

"You see, we theatrical people traveled extensively, and wherever we went, we usually found men who were interested in having an aerie. That's one of the reasons why you find aeries with low numbers even in the East; No. 40 in New York City, No. 42 in Philadelphia and No. 46 in Buffalo."

Aeries mushroomed rapidly. Soon the Fraternal Order of Eagles became nationally known, and the influence and prestige of the fraternity began to make itself felt in significant movements.

EAGLE MOVEMENTS

The first public plea for a national Mothers' Day was made by an Eagle, Frank E. Hering, on February 7, 1904, on the stage of English's Opera House in Indianapolis during a memorial program by Indianapolis Aerie. Under the leadership of Mr. Hering, who became grand worthy president and editor of the Eagle magazine, the idea spread. Subordinate aeries began observing a Mothers' Day, and in 1912 the grand aerie placed Mothers' Day upon the Eagle calendar, 2 years before the event was officially designated for national observance by Congress. In 1929, the American War Mothers officially honored Mr. Hering and the Eagles for their Mothers' Day role by dedicating a plaque at the site of the first Mothers' Day address.

The movement for State old-age pensions, which finally was to spread to practically every State in the Union, began through the initiative of the Eagles in Montana where the first old-age pension act was drafted by Representative Lester H. Loble, who later became grand worthy president. Supported by the Eagles, the measure was signed by the then governor, Joseph M. Dixon, a life member of the order, who said at the time: "You Eagles have planted this seed and you can no more stop the progress of old-age pensions than you can stem the tide of the Pacific Ocean." His words were prophetic. Led by the Eagles, other States began the enactment of similar old-age pension legislation.

Simultaneously, the order launched its pioneering campaign for the National Social Security Act. More than $1,000,000 was spent to publicize the need for such a measure through pamphlets and other literature. When President Roosevelt, a life member of Buffalo, N. Y., Aerie, signed the act in 1935, in presenting the pen to the Eagle delegation which he had invited, he said:

"The pen I am presenting to the order is a symbol of my approval of the fraternity's vision and courage. May its possession inspire your members to rededicate their own efforts and those of the fraternity to the insuring of such economic and political conditions as will bring a greater degree of happiness to our people. * * * Our countrymen owe the Eagles good will for their unselfish service."

Shortly before Mothers' Day was recognized by the Eagles, the order launched two campaigns for social legislation which were to bring a measure of economic security to millions in America.

A mother's pension act, the first in the Nation, was enacted by the State of Missouri in 1911, after Eagles initiated the measure and propelled it into law. The legislation was fathered by the late Judge Edward Everett Porterfield of Kansas City, an Eagle, who had observed the distress of needy widowed mothers in his courtroom. Other States began to follow the lead of Missouri.

A workmen's compensation act, also the first in the Nation, became law in Wisconsin about the same time as the Missouri legislation for mothers, again through the support of the Eagles. Daniel W. Hoan, an Eagle who became mayor of Milwaukee, drafted the measure, and although his proposal was bitterly fought in those early days, it passed, due to the efforts of the Eagles and organized labor.

PATRIOTIC LEADERSHIP

The FOE has taken the leadership in advancing patriotic observances. Emblem Day, commemorating the adoption of the eagle as the national emblem, by the Continental Congress on June 20, 1782, was first observed by aeries, and placed upon the Eagle calendar in 1943. Today, this event is annually observed by aeries and a movement has been started in Congress to proclaim the day as one for national observance. Eagles played an important role in launching America's first Citizenship or I Am an American Day with Manitowoc, Wis., the scene of the first observance.

In peace, stanch champion of the American ideals of freedom and democracy, the FOE in two World Wars rallied with all its resources and energies in the struggle to preserve this heritage.

In World War I, more than 47,000 Eagles served in the Armed Forces. On the home front, aeries bought millions in Liberty bonds, provided entertainment for veterans, boosted morale with letters and gifts to servicemen, and sparked blood donations and salvage drives in many Eagle communities. In World War II, 56,000 Eagles served on all battle fronts of the world, and 3,123 made the supreme sacrifice. On the home front, aeries purchased more than 25 millions in war bonds and the activities to aid the war paralleled those in World War I, only on a more expansive scale as the war continued in intensity.

THE FUTURE

More than a half century of noteworthy achievement and unselfish service behind it, the Fraternal Order of Eagles marches toward new and glorious goals, inspired by the slogan of its golden anniversary year in 1948—"Hats off to the past, coats off to the future." In the offing lies the objectives of Administrative Director Matty Brown: 2,000,000 members and 2,000 aeries. A vital and moving force for brotherhood among all men, America's greatest fraternity, remains steadfast to its oft-proclaimed ideals—liberty, truth, justice, and equality—and to the aims voiced with its founding—"to make human life more desirable by lessening its ills and promoting peace, prosperity, gladness, and hope."

SENATOR McCARTHY'S CHARGES AGAINST THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, today is the birthday of a great American. I well remember that last year I was severely criticized—incidentally, not by Democrats—for making a speech on Lincoln's birthday before the Veterans of Foreign Wars, in which I lauded Abraham Lincoln as a great, outstanding, and wonderful President.

Mr. President, Abraham Lincoln once made a remark which is doubly appropriate on this day. That wise and honest man said:

If you forfeit the confidence of your fellow citizens, you can never again regain their respect and esteem. It is true that you may fool all of the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all of the time; but you can't fool all of the people all of the time.

It is peculiarly fitting that we recall this quotation by Abraham Lincoln, for this is not only the anniversary of Lincoln's birthday, but also the anniversary of the bringing of the charges against the State Department by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY].

The junior Senator from Wisconsin made his first charge against the State Department and the Secretary of State in a Lincoln Day speech last year in my State. He spoke before the Republican Women's League at Wheeling, W. Va., and his speech was broadcast twice over radio station WWVA. I have before me his words which are still preserved on recordings of his speech.

The Senator from Wisconsin said:

I have here in my hand a list of 205 that were known to the Secretary of State as being members of the Communist Party and who, nevertheless, are still working and shaping the policy of the State Department.

Mr. President, many words have been uttered and spread upon the printed page since last year, and from this river of words a fog of confusion has risen and spread across the land. It is, therefore, in keeping with this anniversary that we penetrate to the source of this fog and see what we can do about clearing it up.

In the first place, the junior Senator from Wisconsin soon retreated from his Wheeling, W. Va., speech a few days afterward—on February 20, 1950—the junior Senator from Wisconsin told the Senate:

I told him there were 57 Communists in the State Department—205 who, according to the President's own Security Board, are security risks.

He retreated still further and on May 3, 1950, he explained to me on the floor of the Senate:

I will tell the Senator exactly what I gave the radio station, as far as I know. They were given a rough draft of the speech. It is entirely possible—I have not seen the draft since I gave it—that there was an error and that 205 was used in place of 57 instead of in connection with the Byrnes letter, but there is no doubt in anybody's mind—or in the mind of the Senator—

Referring to me—that in that speech that night I used the figure of 57 as I stated. I said: "I have the names of 57 people in my hand who are either members of or loyal to the Communist Party."

The Wheeling, W. Va., speech was recorded. Affidavits have also been signed by Paul Myers, program director of Station WWVA, and by James K. Whitaker, news editor of radio station WWVA, that the Senator from Wisconsin indeed used the figure of 205.

The junior Senator from Wisconsin has ceased calling them card-carrying Communists and has called them "Communist sympathizers and fellow travelers."

The junior Senator from Wisconsin has attacked what he called the "silly numbers game" in connection with these charges.

Mr. President, let us assume that it is not important whether the junior Senator from Wisconsin accused 205 or 57 State Department employees of being Communists. It is important that he said they were employees of the State Department at the time the charges were made and that that fact was known to the Secretary of State. It is important that he stated at the time he made that speech that a definite number were card-carrying Communists and that the fact was known to the Secretary of State, thus casting a reflection upon that official.

Mr. President, 1 year has passed. The time has come for the junior Senator from Wisconsin to name the alleged Communists in the State Department. Who are they? While the controversy was raging on the floor of the Senate, when the report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations was being presented, the question was asked by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. As I recall the question—and I think I can quote it verbatim—the Senator from Washington said:

I am going back to my home State of Washington, and the first question I am going to be asked there is, "Are there Communists in the State Department?" Now I ask you, Did your committee find at the time of your investigation that there were Communists in the State Department?

To which the Senator from Massachusetts replied, in effect, that the committee did not so find.

Mr. President, for 1 year we have listened to a blue whirl of charges and accusations, but where is the proof? Where it is, Mr. President? Why can it not be introduced? Why can we not have the names of the men who have been charged with being members of the Communist Party and employed in the State Department, even though there be 57 of them? That was the last figure stated. If there are but 57 of them, why have their names not been presented to the Senate of the United States? If there are not that many, why have their names not been presented to the Senate of the United States by the real author of the accusation, whether there be 205 or 57?

Mr. President, I cannot make such a presentation. I would be worried if there were one Communist in a policy-making position in the State Department, as would be every other Member of this body. Yet when I go home to my State, where that speech was originally delivered, I am constantly faced by questions. The Presiding Officer well knows the kind of questions that can be asked by people in Greenbriar County, Mercer County, Monroe County, or Pocahontas County, W. Va. The people in those counties are of pioneer stock. They want to be sure that everything is right. How can I answer their questions unless the names of the alleged Communists are disclosed? If their names cannot be disclosed, we should know who the author is. Who set the number? We should know, Mr. President, so that the people of my State, for whom I speak, can be told the facts.

I represent people of pioneer stock. However, such people are not found only in my State. Thank God, the places where they are found are limited only by the shores of the Atlantic, the shores of the Pacific, the Gulf of Mexico, the Mexican border, and the Canadian border. Thank God, they are found even beyond those borders. Mr. President, we want real government, not phony government. How can we answer the questions unless we know the names of the persons against whom charges were made a year ago? A year's time should be sufficient for anyone to be able to disclose the names of the persons who were so charged. If the names cannot be furnished, we should know who the author is.

The Senator from Wisconsin said he had a list of them. If he had such a list, why was it not put into the RECORD? If a list were put into the RECORD, our people would be satisfied. In that way we could get to the bottom of the charge. Let us not chase around and hunt down some college professor in Baltimore or somewhere else. Let us find out what is wrong. Let us restore the confidence of the American people. We are not concerned so much with newspapers. We are concerned with the foundation of our country, which lies in the men who live in the hollows, along the creeks, on the mountain tops, and on the plains, the harvesters of America's crops and the men in America's factories. They produce the material wealth of this country. Let us satisfy them. If we do so, it will be easy to get rid of persons who are justly accused. If they are erroneously charged, it is easy to clear up the charge. Mr. President, is it not time that the Member of this body who made the charge should come to bat with his proof and not merely with allegations?

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. I understand that the first statement which was made by the Senator from Wisconsin was to the effect that there were 205 persons in the State Department or closely associated with the State Department against whom charges would lie. I think he made that statement in West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. It was made in Wheeling, W. Va. The Senator from Wisconsin said that there were card-carrying Communists in the State Department who were known by the Secretary of State to be such.

Mr. LEHMAN. May I ask the Senator how many of the 205 persons in the State Department, or any other number which was mentioned, who were charged with being such card-carrying Communists, have been proved to be card-carrying members of the Communist Party?

Mr. KILGORE. To the best information of the present speaker, not one such person has been proved on the floor of this Chamber, in any report filed in this Chamber, or in any report filed anywhere to be a card-carrying Communist. For the benefit of the Senator from New York, I may say that I was charged with attempting to whitewash the State Department. All I am asking is what I have been asking for the past 10 months, and I have not had an answer yet. Nevertheless, the author of the charge said I was trying to whitewash the State Department.

Mr. LEHMAN. Is it not a fact that not only did the Senator from West Virginia ask that question but that his colleague the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] asked the same question, and neither Senator has received any satisfaction or information?

Mr. KILGORE. That is absolutely correct. The State of West Virginia was in a turmoil on that point. Everybody was worried. I may say to the Senator from New York that we are a conservative-liberal State. In other words, we are liberal in government, but very conservative in the methods of its operation. Our people are of the pioneer class. They believe in loyalty to their Government. They cannot see anything else. They were terribly upset to hear that a department of their Government might have policy-making officials who were in the Communist category.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Senator from West Virginia is raising the point because the charge was made in his State. Is that correct?

Mr. KILGORE. Partly so.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Senator is making the statement because he feels that the people of the United States ought to know the facts. Is that another reason?

Mr. KILGORE. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Does the Senator feel that if the facts were made known with respect to what has taken place during the last year since the statement was made the people might have a little different opinion concerning their State Department. Is that another reason?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes. Not only that, but I may say to the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. South Carolina.

Mr. KILGORE. South Carolina. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is like calling a West Virginian a Virginian, or vice versa. It starts them fighting. The distinguished Senators from Virginia were born in West Virginia within 3 months of each other, in the same block of the same city, but they are still Virginians, and I am still a West Virginian. I understand the feeling of the Senator from South Carolina. However, that is the situation.

I think that we must have confidence in the policy-making top of the State Department. If we do not have such confidence our entire effort toward winning international peace will fail. If the head of the State Department is in such a position that he should be ousted, I say to the Senator from South Carolina, I want to help oust him. If he should not be ousted, I want the people's confidence restored to the extent that they will back his policies.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Senator feels, does he not, that when a man holding a position as high as that of United States Senator makes a statement to the effect that there are 205 Communists in the State Department and that he can name them, he should have named them during the last year?

Mr. KILGORE. Certainly, I do. There can be no question about it. We have heard nothing but blanket charges. The Senator from South Carolina knows that there could not be maintained in court a blanket charge that there were 50 murderers loose in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is anyone who says that he can name 205 Communists in the State Department, but keeps those names unto himself for a year, doing justice to America?

Mr. KILGORE. I may say to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina that I do not have my notes before me. The Official Reporter has taken them. I think my notes show that the statement which was made by the Senator from Wisconsin was, "I have in my hand a list of 205 known Communists who are known to the Secretary of State to be Communists, and who are in a policy-making position in the State Department." I cannot quote the statement verbatim because I do not have my notes before me.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I am not a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but is there any record anywhere that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] at any time before making the statement to which reference has been made went to the State Department and told the officials there that he knew of any Communists in the State Department?

Mr. KILGORE. It was later developed here that he had notified them. It came out in connection with the number of 57, or something else.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Did he give the Department the names of any of them?

Mr. KILGORE. No; the names of the 205 or the 57 have never been procured, or of the 7. How many wise and how many foolish virgins were there? I am not playing the numbers racket; I am discussing traitors—let us call them plain, common, garden variety of traitors—and I want to know their names.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LEHMAN. In addition to the statements to which the Senator from West Virginia has referred, covering a list of 205 alleged traitors, none of whom have been shown to be in any way disloyal, and the names of none of whom have been disclosed, does the Senator not recall, as I do, that on the floor of the Senate there has been an attempt to blacken the names of great Americans, patriotic and loyal Americans, who have served their country with distinction and devotion? I can mention the names of only a few to show the type of men who have been attacked on the floor of the Senate without one shred of evidence, purely on the basis of irresponsible and vicious statements, men like Secretary Acheson, Ambassador at Large Philip P. Jessup, Minister Vincent, Secretary Marshall, and Secretary Hull.

Mr. KILGORE. What the Senator says is true, but not one scintilla of evidence has been offered to prove the statements. It is easy to call men names. Let me say that people called Abraham Lincoln, with all his Americanism, a Socialist, which in his day was equivalent to calling a man a Communist or even worse. People called Thomas Jefferson a Red Communist. Various others have been called all sorts of names. But the question always has been as to producing some evidence to prove the charge. It is possible to call a man almost anything, provided he does not take it out on his traducer personally, or is in a position where he can sue him. In New York State there is a ruling of the supreme court to the effect that calling a man a Communist is libelous per se. Unfortunately, such rule does not prevail in many other States. Had it prevailed, there would have been many "busted" people in this country due to libel suits. It is possible to charge anyone with anything.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Does the Senator not agree with me that to seek to blacken the names and reputations of men of the character of those I have just mentioned is below the dignity and responsibility of a Member of the United States Senate?

Mr. KILGORE. I would say yes, because, let me say to the distinguished Senator from New York, relatively a Member of the United States Senate ranks next to the President and the Vice President, even higher than a Cabinet officer, or the head of any department or agency, even higher than the Chief of Staff of the Army, or the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. For a man so elevated by his people to take an unfair advantage, and to so use his position is—I do not believe I need to say just what I think it is.

Mr. LEHMAN. I thank the Senator. I fully agree with him.

Mr. KILGORE. I yield the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I merely wish to make an observation with reference to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and also to commend him upon his forthright statement today. I had hoped at an earlier time, when the able junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] was making his remarks, likewise to commend him for his courage and for his insight into what I consider to be a most difficult and perplexing problem before the American people.

Mr. President, I have this observation to offer in my own behalf. Without looking into the merits or demerits of what has transpired during the past year, I wish to say that the greatest tragedy that can befall the cause of human freedom in this critical hour of world history is to undermine faith in representative government, to undermine faith in the elected representative of the people, and the apparatus of government which serves our Nation.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not a fact that the elected representatives of government are the difference between totalitarianism and democracy?

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is, indeed.

Mr. KILGORE. If we eliminate the elected representatives of the people as a curb upon the executive branch of the government, we wipe out any idea of either a republican or democratic form of government. Is that not correct?

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. KILGORE. Therefore an effort to undermine the confidence of the people in their Government is a direct blow at the American way of life. Is that not correct?

Mr. HUMPHREY. It surely appears that way to the Senator from Minnesota. Now I should like to continue my observation, and then I shall yield to any other Senator who desires to make any inquiry.

It appears to me that fear and suspicion is growing throughout the country. American freedom cannot live in an environment filled with suspicion, and American political institutions cannot live in an environment filled with fear. It is true of those of my colleagues with whom I have talked about the matter that, unfortunately, much of the mail received from home during the past year has indicated that there is doubt and great suspicion in the hearts and minds of thousands and thousands of people.

It is true that the attack of the junior Senator from Wisconsin has been very effective politically, but it has been very unfortunate morally, and in terms of the preservation of free institutions. I have no doubt that politically, speaking in terms of elections, it has been a powerful and perhaps successful attack, but I think what is more important to keep in mind is not whether this kind of attack is successful politically, but what it means in the long run, for the solvency, the security, and the stability of free political, economic, and cultural institutions.

Unfortunately, it seems to me, there is today a psychosis of fear in our Nation, at a time when our people should be imaginative and creative, at a time when we should have people in Government who are trying to think out new answers to meet new problems. I would say that it is a tragedy that members of the Senate permitted this to happen.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to get the idea of partisanship on this side of the aisle or on the other side of the aisle out of the picture. We frequently denominate ourselves as being the greatest deliberative body in the world. The Senator has heard that statement made, has he not?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. We frequently hear speakers make that statement. We are prideful of the fact that we are the greatest deliberative body in the world. Deliberation means thoughtful consideration. We are a deliberative body. That means that we should have a basis of fact upon which deliberation may be based. I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he does not think it is incumbent upon this body, as the greatest deliberative body in the world, to insist that the proofs be shown to this body, that it be shown that the charges are factually correct, and if not, that the charges be retracted?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I agree with the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. I believe the Senate should defend itself in the eyes of the people of the United States as being the greatest deliberative body in the world.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. It seems to me almost axiomatic that a man sitting on a committee which has the responsibility of appropriating money for a bureau or a department should approach his task in a purely objective manner, without either favor or bias. The junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], on the floor of the Senate a few days ago, very courageously pointed out the fact that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] had been appointed a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee in charge of appropriations for the State Department, and that there could be no question with regard to his bias against the State Department. Hundreds of utterances by the Senator from Wisconsin have given clear evidence of this. He should not have been appointed to the Appropriations Subcommittee dealing with funds for the State Department.

Yet, even after that clear and courageous statement by the Senator from Connecticut, very few newspapers in this country made any substantial mention of the speech, or of the issue involved. In my opinion it was a very great moral issue, a very great issue of good government. The newspapers simply permitted the issue to die without any substantial reference to it. It seems to me that this circumstance bears out just what the Senator from Minnesota said a few minutes ago, that there is hysteria, that there is panic, that there is fear on the part of people that if they raise their voices in any way in defense of those who may be accused irresponsibly, they will be accused of being "soft" toward communism.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from New York for his statement. The reason the Senator from Minnesota referred to the fear, hysteria, and suspicion is that it is a disease which can consume our strength. This is a time when we need to put away fear, this is the time when we need a sense of calm, this is the time when we need a sense of trust in our Government.

Many letters have come to my office on this subject. Last evening I took home with me between two and three thousand letters which have come to my office in the last few weeks on the issue of foreign policy. In many of the letters I read of the lack of trust and lack of faith in our Secretary of State, in our President, in our Government, arising from charges made on the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I wish to make this comment in reference to our Secretary of State, because the charges center around him and around our State Department. Without having too much intimate knowledge about the State Department, but just about as, I would say, the average Representative or the average United States Senator has, I say that the present Secretary of State is an able, conscientious, patriotic, devoted public servant, who has dedicated a lifetime of service in the struggle for freedom, and has dedicated his physical energy, his emotional and mental capacities in the struggle against communism. I think that is a matter of record. There is not one scintilla of evidence that could lead anyone to believe any time, any place, anywhere, that the present Secretary of State or any of his predecessors have ever been even remotely sympathetic to communism as a philosophy, an ideology, or as a practicing form of political organization. I submit that many of the men who have been under attack are great Americans. The distinguished Senator from New York mentioned Phillip Jessup, who is not only a great American, but who is a great world citizen.

I likewise submit that there are as many capable, honest, devoted servants in the State Department as there are in any branch of our Government or in any branch of any government in the United States—State or local. There may be some incompetents, but I would venture to say one could find some incompetents in the largest corporations or in the best trade-unions, or even within the Congress or the judiciary.

I submit that if there are Communists in the State Department, we have the machinery to find out. I shall always believe that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its agents are more qualified to find Communists than any United States Senator. If there is a United States Senator who is better qualified than Mr. Hoover, I submit he should seek Mr. Hoover's job, because we need the best at the top of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

I am likewise convinced that our Attorney General, the man at the head of the Department of Justice, a man of deep religious faith, a man of conviction and honor, a former United States Senator, who served in this body with honor, as well as the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, would not be going around coddling Communists or covering up for them to please any political party or any member of the Government.

If the Department of Justice does not have the manpower it needs in order to do the things which need to be done, I submit that we should vote for the necessary appropriations, instead of trying to get ourselves junior G-man badges and trying to act as supersleuths, when we are not equipped, by either experience or background, to do so.

The question before us is a simple one, as was the question a year ago—namely, are there 205 Communists, known to the Secretary of State, in the State Department? If 205 is the wrong number, the next question is, are there 57, or are there 7, or are there any?

If the charges are not true, then I suggest that someone should refrain from further comment about the alleged subversion in this Government, because the best way in the world to break down the spirit of the American people and their morale, the best way to destroy the faith of the American people in the entire mobilization program, the best way to sell out this country to the Communists, is to make false charges—any kind of false charges, whether false charges of corruption or subversion or whatever else it may be.

Mr. President, this is a time when we need to believe in democracy. Our procedures should conform to the democratic spirit.

No one in the world has a greater responsibility to live and breathe for democracy and to do his utmost to make it work than the Members of the United States Senate or of the House of Representatives of the United States Government. We are the ones who at this hour should lead in asserting a steadfast belief in democracy, and we should do so by exercising leadership, both political and moral.

So let me suggest to the Senators on both sides of the aisle that charges be documented so that they will be able to stand up in a court of law. If there is not such evidence and such documentation, the charges never should be made, because to destroy faith in our Government is to strike a blow deep in the heart of freedom; and to destroy the name of a man is to perform the most immoral, un-Christian, indecent act which possibly could be done, for, Mr. President, after all, the name, the reputation, and the character of a man are his most precious heritage.

I submit to you, Mr. President, that the Secretary of State of our country has been maligned and abused, and he has been the victim of unfair and unjustified criticism, to a point where the poor man's heart must be breaking. Bad enough it is that he should be maligned by false charges, but it is worse that one who is in such a responsible position should be maligned. Have you noticed, Mr. President, that every time our Secretary of State is about to enter into negotiations or is about to attend a conference of foreign ministers, or every time he is about to go to a meeting of the United Nations, on a great mission of hope and of peace, every time our Secretary of State is about to enter into such important transactions, the daggers come out and the epithets are hurled against him. To me, Mr. President, such action is not very patriotic, particularly at times like the present ones.

As long as Mr. Acheson is our Secretary of State and as long as he is to be our negotiator in the councils of the nations, he has to be the strongest man he possibly can be; and we should not undercut him every time he is about to enter into consultations and negotiations. We would do well to remember that wars are not won by military power alone. They are also won by the spirit of the people, the high moral sense of the people, the idealism of the people, and the forthrightness of the people and their leaders.

We are spending billions of dollars now to equip ourselves with atomic weapons, B–36's, and bazookas. I think it would be well for us to spend a little time each day in equipping ourselves with honesty of purpose and a carefully planned and carefully considered program, and to work for confidence in and respect for our own leaders, as they try to protect the best interests of this Republic.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, with considerable surprise I have listened to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] and my distinguished colleague the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], and just now the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if they are good Democrats, the less they say about this matter the better, because it stinks to high heaven.

Mr. President, we appropriated $2,000,000,000 for the development of the atom bomb, and we turned that money over entirely to the Democratic Party, to Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt. We said, "Go ahead. Hire whomever you wish. You do not have to account for a dollar of the $2,000,000,000; but we are depending on you, sir, as President of the United States, to protect even the most humble citizen of this country."

Mr. President, how did the Democratic Party perform that assignment? They spent the $2,000,000,000, all right; but although the FBI had millions of dollars, although the Secretary of State had million of dollars more, all the time—for 14 months—down in New Mexico sat Dr. Fuchs, the spy, the known Communist, the man who, day after day after day after day, as our Government was developing the atom bomb, was giving the secrets to Russia.

I say shame on a party, shame on the Democratic Party, which would defend that kind of thing. They had warnings. The President had warnings from Canada. In Canada the spies were convicted; and the Canadian Government said to our Government, "In your Government there are spies working in conjunction with the spies who have been at work here in Canada."

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield; I did not interrupt any of the three Senators whom I have mentioned. I sat here in disgust, listening to their speeches, in which they attacked a Member of the Senate who is not present today. They attacked a fellow Senator at a time when he was not present.

Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] has been on this floor day after day, week after week, month after month, but those Senators waited until he was away, when they knew they would be safe, when they knew he was absent from Washington, giving a Lincoln Day speech; and then they rose here on the floor of the United States Senate and attacked him.

To whom did the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] go? Did he go to a subordinate? Did he go to a Cabinet officer? No, he went to the President of the United States. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 2, page 1953, I find a telegram sent to the President by the Senator from Wisconsin, reading as follows:

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
White House, Washington, D. C.:

In the Lincoln Day speech at Wheeling Thursday night I stated that the State Department harbors a nest of Communists and Communist sympathizers who are helping to shape our foreign policy. I further stated that I have in my possession the names of 57 Communists who are in the State Department at present. A State Department spokesman promptly denied this, claiming that there is not a single Communist in the Department. You can convince yourself of the falsity of the State Department claim very easily. You will recall that you personally appointed a board to screen State Department employees for the purpose of weeding out fellow travelers—men whom the board considered dangerous to the security of this Nation.

Mind you, Mr. President, this is a telegram which was sent to Harry S. Truman, as President of the United States, by a United States Senator. I continue:

Your Board did a painstaking job, and named hundreds which had been listed as dangerous to the security of the Nation, because of communistic connections.

While the records are not available to me, I know absolutely of one group of approximately 300 certified to the Secretary for discharge because of communism. He actually only discharged approximately 80.

That is, 80 out of 300. I continue:

I understand that this was done after lengthy consultation with the now-convicted traitor, Alger Hiss. I would suggest, therefore, Mr. President, that you simply pick up your phone and ask Mr. Acheson how many of those whom your Board—

"Your Board," Mr. President—the Board appointed by the President, himself. Continuing—how many of those whom your Board had labeled as dangerous Communists he failed to discharge. The day the House Un-American Activities Committee exposed Alger Hiss as an important link in an international Communist spy ring you signed an order forbidding the State Department's giving any information in regard to the disloyalty or the communistic connections of anyone in that Department to the Congress.

The President would not give any information to this very body. The telegram continues:

Despite this State Department black-out, we have been able to compile a list of 57 Communists in the State Department. This list is available to you but you can get a much longer list by ordering Secretary Acheson to give you a list of those whom your own Board listed as being disloyal and who are still working in the State Department. I believe the following is the minimum which can be expected of you in this case.

1. That you demand that Acheson give you and the proper congressional committee the names and a complete report on all of those who were placed in the Department by Alger Hiss, and all of those still working in the State Department who were listed by your Board as bad security risks because of their communistic connections.

2. That you promptly revoke the order in which you provided under no circumstances could a congressional committee obtain any information or help in exposing Communists.

Failure on your part will label the Democratic Party of being the bedfellow of international communism. Certainly this label is not deserved by the hundreds of thousands of loyal American Democrats throughout the Nation, and by the sizable number of able loyal Democrats in both the Senate and the House.

Mr. President, what more could any United States Senator do than that?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator from North Dakota has propounded a question.

Mr. LANGER. I propounded no question to the distinguished Senator, and I decline to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. LANGER What more could any United States Senator do than to advise the President of the United States? I do not know why Harry Truman did not promptly pick up his telephone and call the Senator from Wisconsin. That is what the average President certainly would have done. He would have said, "Senator McCARTHY, come to see me. You are only five or six blocks away. Come here, and lay down your list. You say there are 57 Communists in the Department. I want to know who they are. If my Secretary of State has not been doing a good job, I want to know about it. I appointed him, and the Senate voted to confirm him. Together, the Congress and I, we put him in the State Department. Let us talk it over. If there is anything wrong in the Department, I, Harry Truman, want to know it." Was not that due any United States Senator? Whether he belonged to the Republican Party or to the Democratic Party or was a nonpartisan, was it not a simple courtesy due him? But Harry S. Truman did not even reply to the telegram.

Mind you, Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin and President Truman had not had any trouble, they were friends. Several Senators have been Governors of their States, as I have been the Governor of my State. When a complaint came in against the head of any department, what would any governor do but call in the man who made the complaint and say, "Present your proof today, away from any newspapers."

President Truman could have said to the Senator from Wisconsin, "I want your proof." There is all the more reason for the President to call upon him, because Mr. Acheson had said, after Alger Hiss was convicted, "I will not turn my back on Alger Hiss." That should have put the President on notice.

I think the Senator from Wisconsin, when he offered to present all his proof to the President of the United States, did as much as any Senator could be expected to do. No sane man will contend that a United States Senator, with a salary of $12,000 a year and an expense account of $2,500, is going to be able to make an investigation entailing the spending of thousands upon thousands of dollars.

Let us look at it in reverse, Mr. President. Supposing the Senator from Wisconsin had not telegraphed the President and it could be shown afterwards that he had knowledge of these men being in the State Department: then the very Senators who today are condemning the Senator from Wisconsin would be condemning him for not telling the President of the United States about it. They would say, "You had notice that there were 57 Communists in the State Department and you kept silent. Because of your silence you are guilty."

I say, Mr. President, that when a United States Senator gets in touch with the Chief Executive he does all that my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], my distinguished friend from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], or my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] could do had they been in a situation in which the Senator from Wisconsin found himself.

I myself as a Senator from North Dakota, when, on two occasions, there was something wrong, promptly called the White House and told all about it. I think that is a duty which every Senator owes to the President of the United States.

Mr. President, a charge is made with reference to the Senator from Wisconsin being on a certain committee. I do not know the facts about it, but I have here the statement made by the minority leader of February 1. He said:

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there are certain rules by which we operate. Those rules have absolutely been maintained in connection with the appointment of Senators to committees, legislative committees and otherwise. I am quite satisfied that the members of the Republican committee on committees did not interrogate anyone with reference to his feelings about the State Department or how he felt regarding the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON]. They went ahead and organized efficiently according to the rules of the conference with reference to seniority. Of course there were some disappointments in connection with membership on some committees. For example, last year the Republicans attempted to place on the Small Business Committee certain Senators who had had long service in that connection, and we very humbly made suggestions to the majority party. But what happened? They were all ignored; their service did not count for anything. Oh, no; they had been somewhat hard on the administration, and, therefore, there would be new faces on that committee.

The minority leader said there was nothing unusual about the way in which the members of the committee were chosen. He said:

They went ahead and organized efficiently according to the rules of the conference with reference to seniority.

If that is not true, certainly some Senator on the other side of the aisle should have told the minority leader about it. I do not hold any brief——

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. The Senator says someone should have told the Senator from Nebraska about it. The Senator from Nebraska made a half-hour speech on the subject.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] had spoken ahead of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], and it is the reply of the Senator from Nebraska that I have been reading. He said:

> They wer ' ahead and organized efficiently according to the rules of the conference with reference to seniority.

If that was not true, the fact should be established.

Mr. LEHMAN Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. With all respect to the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], it was my feeling when I heard that reply, and it is still my feeling, that it was not responsive to the statement made in the speech of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON].

Mr. LANGER. Let us see. That can be very easily determined. I have before me the speech of the Senator from Connecticut. Shall I read it all?

Mr. LEHMAN. I should be glad if the Senator would read his speech.

Mr. LANGER. I have read it, and I think the answer of the Senator from Nebraska was a perfect reply.

Mr. LEHMAN. I understood the Senator from North Dakota to ask me whether I suggested that he read the speech of the Senator from Connecticut. I might say that I think it is such a good speech, and so important, because it raised an issue of government, that I should be delighted to have the Senator read it again on the floor of the Senate. I think it is a most important speech. But I do not want to advise the Senator to read it and take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. LANGER. I do not mind. We have plenty of time—at least, I have. But I think the Senator from Nebraska answered the speech of the Senator from Connecticut perfectly. Here is what the Senator from Connecticut said, and it appears at page 865 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I rise to utter a brief but very solemn warning. This week I called on former Secretary of State Cordell Hull. Secretary Hull honors me by permitting me to visit him every few months, and it has been my custom to do so since even before my service as Assistant Secretary of State.
> As I entered the room Secretary and Mrs. Hull were watching on the television the proceedings at Lake Success. I wish every Member of the Senate could have been with me and could have heard Secretary Hull's wise and penetrating discussion of the vast problems with which we are faced today. I am sure Secretary Hull will not mind my reporting to his old colleagues in the Senate that he is deeply concerned because we here are devoting so much of our time to matters of relative insignificance, while the world is trembling on the edge of catastrophe. I am sure he will not——

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. I think most of us heard the speech made by the Senator from Connecticut or have since read it. I do not think the Senator from Connecticut has been available to have a conference with me since he made his speech. As chairman of the Republican committee on committees, I intend to do him the courtesy of a personal interview. I personally do not think it is necessary to read his speech at this time, unless the Senator from New York insists.

Mr. LEHMAN. The Senator from New York did not suggest the reading of it. He simply replied to an inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota. The discretion with regard to the reading of the speech rests entirely on the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the only reason I suggested reading it was that my distinguished friend from New York said that the Senator from Nebraska was not responsive in his answer to the Senator from Connecticut. I think his answer was responsive. I think the speech of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] fully answered the Senator from Connecticut. I happen to be a member of the committee on committees, and, so help me, I do not know of one solitary thing that was done for the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] that was not done for every other Member of the United States Senate. We took them in order of seniority.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I suggest that the difficulty which exists between my good friend the Senator from Connecticut and the members of the Republican committee on committees be resolved in a private conference, as our fine friend from Nebraska suggests. I think all of us have read the RECORD. I heard the speech of the Senator from Connecticut. I also heard the distinguished minority leader's reply and my colleague's reply. I believe it is merely a matter of difference of opinion as to whether or not the appropriate policy was carried out. Since a quorum is not present—and perhaps we should have present if we are to go into a discussion of this subject—I suggest that we rely on the integrity of everyone's rereading the address of the Senator from Connecticut, and coming to his own conclusions with respect to what was suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. I know that my good friend from North Dakota would give a most interpretative reading of the speech delivered by the Senator from Connecticut. However, I heard the speech when it was delivered. It was a very good speech. I thought so the first time I heard it. I still carry with me in my heart and soul the impression that it was a good speech, and I should like to leave it that way.

Mr. LANGER. Perhaps I could do a better job than the Senator from Connecticut did the first time, though his is a very interesting and fine speech.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I had in mind making a short address on a subject entirely foreign to the matter which has been under discussion for some time. However, it is entirely proper for me to have at least a few words to say with respect to the subject which was initiated by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE].

As one Member on this side of the aisle I am delighted to know that my friends on the other side of the aisle take recognition of the great day of February 12, and help us celebrate it. I think a February 12 appearance in West Virginia last year must have made quite an impression. It is being repeated here today. To the best of my recollection it has been repeated perhaps thousands of times over the Nation. I was impressed with the patriotic speech made by the acting majority leader. If my recollection serves me correctly, in describing the Secretary of State he referred to him as "an able, patriotic, and devoted servant."

Mr. President, I know of no more able, patriotic, or devoted servant of the American people than the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY]. Certainly we can have differences of opinion without losing all sense of reason. I trust that the Members of the Senate on the majority side are not too discouraged because they think that 1 member of a committee of 21 members is not in complete accord with the views of the State Department. I do not know why they should think it to be such a terrible thing. Surely 1 man on a committee of 21 members is not going to control the committee. He is only one member. I do not know how many members sit on the subcommittees. I think it is five. Surely one member out of five is not going to have any undue influence. Therefore I hope that my good friends on the other side of the aisle will not become too much exercised over the appointment that was made by my committee of the Senator from Wisconsin to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. I should like to get to my other statement.

Mr. KILGORE. I have only two short questions to ask.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator from Nebraska, of course, recognizes the fact that I was not on the floor when the controversy arose with respect to the membership of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he agrees with me—and I am making no reflection on the junior Senator from Wisconsin—that the Senator from Wisconsin should furnish to the Senate the names of the persons to whom he referred. That is all I ask.

I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he agrees with me that this body should be furnished with the names of the persons who were employed by the State Department in policy-making capacities on February 12, 1950, who were known by the Secretary of State to be card-carrying Communists. I do not think that is an unreasonable request to be made by a member of the majority party, a member of the minority party, or by any Member of this body in any capacity. It should not be considered unreasonable to make such a request 1 years after the charge was made in numbers only, particularly when the charge caused so much disruption in the State of West Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. I will answer the distinguished Senator's question in this way. I believe the Senator said not once, but several times, as did the junior Senator from Minnesota, that he did not care whether the charges involved 201 persons or 1 person.

Mr. KILGORE. The junior Senator from West Virginia, not Minnesota.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. If my memory serves me correctly, in the last year there has been more than one conviction in court of men who certainly were indirectly, if not directly, connected with the State Department.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I do not care to yield again at this time. There are thousands of people in every one of the 48 States in the Union who have confidence in the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY]. I am sure there are millions of people all over the Nation who have confidence in the McCarthy charges.

Mr. President, a subcommittee was appointed following the adoption of a resolution by the Senate. We thought the resolution was a good resolution. We thought it was watertight. Nevertheless, the subcommittee did an excellent job of whitewashing. I am inclined to think that if the subcommittee had done a thorough job we would have been spared much of the worry that has arisen since that time.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. I decline to yield at this time. If President Truman will take the padlocks off the files of the State Department, the McCarthy inquiry can be completed. It will not be completed until the padlocks are taken off the files. I should like what I have said to be the final word, if the Senator from West Virginia is agreeable.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator has not answered my question. Does he think it fair to this body not to be told the names of the persons to whom the Senator from Wisconsin has referred, and of whom he said he had a list?

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. I will refer the Senator from West Virginia to the records of the Tydings subcommittee. I think they contain all the answers he wants.

Mr. LANGER. And the election.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Yes. Mr. President, I should now like to address myself to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

GERMAN COOPERATION IN THE DEFENSE OF WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, in the course of General Eisenhower's report to the Congress a little over a week ago, he said:

> I am not even going to mention my several conversations in Germany and for a very specific reason. I personally think that there has to be a political platform achieved and an understanding reached that will contemplate an eventual and earned equality on the part of that nation before we should start to talk about including units of Germans in any kind of an army. I, certainly, for one commander, want no unwilling contingent, no soldiers serving in the pattern of the Hessians who served in our Revolutionary War, serving in any army I command. Therefore until the political leaders, the diplomats, and the statesmen find the proper answer, it is not for a soldier to delve in too deeply.

Mr. President, what General Eisenhower obviously meant, without putting it into so many words, is that we cannot expect the Germans to be loyal to western ideals and to the western alliance so long as we continue to persecute them. Nothing can be more obvious than that fact. Many of us over the years have taken the floor of the Senate to emphasize that fact and to point out how our policies toward Germany have been destructive of any possibility of cooperation with the German people. The tragedy is that we had to wait so long for any slight recognition of that problem by anyone in the councils of this administration.

If we really want the cooperation of the Germans, we shall have to right some of the wrongs of the last few years, and it may be good for our souls to recall some of those wrongs.

First was the Morgenthau plan, that foolish and unworkable notion that German industry could be destroyed and the Germans forced to resume the life of a peasant nation with most of her people living off the land. That idea was completely unworkable, simply because there is not enough land in Western Germany to support all of her population. Yet that program was seriously tried. Until very recently, we were still tearing down German factories, while with the other hand we dispensed relief to the starving German unemployed.

Next was the displacement of millions of German people and those of German extraction from the border lands of Czechoslovakia and Poland and from settlements in Eastern Europe. Thirteen million of them were displaced altogether—forced into Western Germany and simply turned loose without food, clothing, or shelter. No adequate provision or program for these poor people has ever been made by this administration, even when we had displaced persons legislation up for action. It was almost impossible to secure real consideration for these unfortunate people.

Next is the problem of the property of Germans seized by the Alien Property Custodian in this country. Time after time proposals have been made for some slight relaxation of the rigid rules of the Office of Alien Property so as to recognize at least a few of the meritorious claims of Germans to their own property. During the last 2 years, I have sponsored two different bills designed to do justice to the Germans on this question. One of them would simply have extended the date within which time claims could have been filed for the return of property to which the claimants were already legally entitled. The second one, in which I joined with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and several others, would have permitted Germans to acquire property bequeathed or given to them by American citizens.

On both those bills, we had the cooperation of the distinguished chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. Both measures passed the Senate, but they were pigeonholed in the House because of the hostility of the Alien Property Custodian.

The treatment of those two bills is a sample of the attitude of this administration toward the German nation. Some spokesmen of this administration occasionally speak a kind word for Germany, but their actions do not support their words.

Now we are in trouble and we ask for the help of the Germans. They are not inclined to join our armies. Is there anything surprising in that?

Mr. President, we must have German cooperation if Western Europe is to be saved. We cannot expect to secure it so long as we treat Germany as a second-class nation. Most of us now realize that we must grant the Germans full equality and recognize their rights and legitimate aspirations. Since that is the case, why do we not accept them into full partnership willingly and promptly? Why must we appear to make each concession grudgingly, only after it has been forced from us? How can we expect to secure a willing partner that way?

Mr. President, we have played into Communist hands throughout in our treatment of Germany. The Communists wanted us to be severe and unreasonable toward the Germans, while at the same time Communist Russia pretended to be friendly and generous. By that means, the Communists hoped to turn the Germans against democracy and toward communism. If they have not succeeded, it is not our fault. Our policies since VE-day and before have been tailored to suit the wishes of communism.

Mr. President, it is time we make a drastic change in our whole outlook toward the German nation and the German people.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] for what he has just said relative to the friendly and unfriendly relations between the people of Germany and the people of America. What he says about the actions of the American people being influenced by Communists is, in my opinion, the absolute truth.

The Morgenthau plan of starvation was not drawn up by Mr. Morgenthau at all; it was drawn up by Harry Dexter White, a man who was in the Department of State, and who committed suicide, I believe, 5 days after he was subpenaed by the Committee on un-American Activities.

In regard to the dismantling proposal, time and time again the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], both the Senators from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART and Mr. JENNER], both the Senators from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WHERRY], the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and others, rose and pleaded that the dismantling be stopped.

For example, take the case of the fertilizer plants. At the very time the fertilizer plants in Germany were being torn down, New York firms got contracts to ship fertilizer to Germany, the contracts running into the millions of dollars. The sad thing is that this fertilizer arrived in Germany too late, long after the time had gone by for the German people to use it in the spring of the year. So that fertilizer was wasted. Plant after plant after plant in Germany was dismantled and bodily moved to Russia.

Mr. President, that is not the worst of it. There were men on the payroll of the United States Government who had worked here on the Daily Worker, and had taken part in communistic activities, who changed their names. They were on the payroll of the United States Government, and were sent to Germany to assist American courts, where there were American judges and American prosecutors. They assisted there in the denazification program.

The result was that every school teacher, every scientist, every engineer, was automatically banned from work. Russia did not have a denazification program, and very promptly hired all these people, 50,000 of them, as nearly as we can estimate the number, including engineers who had been operating under Hitler preparing engines of destruction, and working on submarines. All of them were put on the payroll of the Kremlin. There they finished up the different jobs they had commenced under Hitler, and today, according to the Navy, Russia is almost supreme in the matter of submarines, having many more than we have, and having some which can remain under water longer than ours can.

Mr. President, that is not all. In addition to all I have mentioned, there are in Germany the 13,000,000 expellees, men from the Sudeten lands, so well described by the senior Senator from Nebraska. Under the German law these people automatically became German citizens. They did not have to be naturalized in Germany. They were citizens the moment they entered, although their ancestors may have left 100 or 200 or 500 or 800 years before. What happened? The International Refugee Organization was established. Its purpose was to take care of every child in the world except German children. The Senate approved that organization. The German children could starve to death so far as the International Refugee Organization was concerned.

That was not all. We now send over there General Eisenhower, the man whose forces had previously bombed the Germans and who held off his troops while the Russians moved in and raped, according to the statistics, 85 percent of the women in Austria and Germany. The very man, Mr. President, who had charge of the American troops, and held them off, and did not let them go in, we send now to Germany to plead with the Germans to join up with the Americans and the other Atlantic Pact forces and to fight shoulder to shoulder with us.

What do the German people think about that, Mr. President? They held an election there about 8 weeks ago Sunday, and in Württemberg-Baden, which it is stated had never before voted Social Democratic, the people voted for the Social Democrat ticket. The chief plank of the Social Democratic Party was a plank in opposition to rearmament. That is the first time such a thing had occurred in Württemberg-Baden.

In the state of Hesse a similar election was held, and by an overwhelming vote similar action was taken.

Bavaria is a solid Catholic state, a state overwhelmingly opposed to communism; yet, by an overwhelming vote, the Social Democrats carried Bavaria.

So is it any wonder that on the 19th day of January the Wall Street Journal said that the high commissioner, Mr. McCloy, had taken a secret poll and found that only 5 percent of the Germans would volunteer to fight with us? He also found that if a draft law were passed, only 10 percent would obey the draft. Is it any wonder that when General Eisenhower returned to the United States and talked to us he very skillfully omitted any reference to Germany at all? He counted them off as far as we were concerned, and as far as defense is concerned.

Mr. President, I want to pay public tribute to the work done by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] who time and time again has risen on the Senate floor and pleaded with Senators on this subject. He prophesied what would take place unless we stopped the dismantling of German industrial plants, unless we treated the German people on more of a basis of equality than we were doing at that particular time.

Mr. President, an American soldier could marry a German girl if he obtained the consent of the military. Congress passed the Anti-Communist Act some time ago in spite of what many of us tried to do to stop it. That act bars from coming to America and joining her husband the bride of an American soldier, if she is of German origin and went to school in Germany, even though she went to school only until she was 10 or 11 or 12 years old, and even though she may have a baby. Even though the man who married this German girl is a veteran, he cannot bring his wife to this country. The night that act was passed 200,000 Germans had applied for visas to come to America. One thousand two hundred of them were on a ship. They had sold their property in Germany. They had quit their jobs. They had said good-by to their relatives. They had sold their furniture. They were coming here to the land of the free and the home of the brave. When they got to Ellis Island the 1,200 of them were taken off the ship and sent back to Germany.

Mr. President, I do not have time to go into all the details of the matter, but I could not refrain from complimenting my distinguished friend, the Senator from Nebraska. I want the people of Germany, and I want the people of Nebraska to know that the German people have a friend in the Senate who time and time without number has risen to the defense of what was right in trying to secure justice for the relatives of the 33,000,000 citizens of German ancestry who live in this country. We have them in Nebraska, we have them in Missouri, we have them in Montana, in North Dakota, in South Dakota, in Minnesota—we have them all over in America, and they are good citizens. They are loyal, true Americans. But they cannot bring in their sister or brothers or other relatives because of the so-called Anti-Communist Act which was passed a short time ago. That is simply a travesty on justice.

Therefore, Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with my distinguished colleague from Nebraska at this particular time in bringing to the attention of the Senate the situation of the people of Western Germany.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I think it is fitting and proper to end this legislative session with a little quotation from Abraham Lincoln, who said:

> With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right.

We have had a heated discussion this afternoon. I am always very much moved by the eloquence, the oratory, and persuasiveness of the arguments of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota. I should like, however, to correct the RECORD in one respect, because I know the Senator from North Dakota is accurate in his presentations. He has a great legal mind. I should like to have the RECORD read as it should read.

No. 1: The telegram on the part of the junior Senator from Wisconsin to the President, to which the Senator from North Dakota referred, was sent after the speech in West Virginia. It was after the charge was made.

Mr. LANGER. The 20th of February.

Mr. HUMPHREY. After the date. I am very happy the date is properly recorded.

Secondly, that the number of 57 alleged Communists in the State Department was a number that was resurrected, recreated, rehabilitated out of the rather moth-eaten and weather-beaten records of the Eightieth Congress in the House of Representatives when the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and one of the subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, after having held exhaustive hearings, came to the conclusion unanimously that the 57 were not Communists; and after a full and exhaustive examination, recommended that all charges be dismissed. There were speeches galore made on the floor of the House of Representatives to the effect that it would be better if we just forget the whole thing. I thought maybe it would be good to bring that point up right now, and

I do bring it up in the spirit of the profound remarks made by the immortal emancipator, Abraham Lincoln.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I now desire to make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENNINGS in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, and withdrawing sundry nominations in the Coast Guard, which nominating messages were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of William Jennings Bryan, Jr., of Los Angeles, Calif., to be collector of customs, customs collection district No. 27, with headquarters at Los Angeles, Calif.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination which has just been stated?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to the nomination of William Jennings Bryan, Jr., I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate a pamphlet entitled "Civilian Nominations," which I obtained a few days ago, which gives a list of all civilian nominations submitted by the President to the Senate during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, from January 27, 1950, to the sine die adjournment on January 2, 1951. I know everyone will be interested to know what appointments were made, and from what State the appointees came. The first one with respect to whom his State is given, is Holmes Baldridge, of Oklahoma, to be an Assistant Attorney General. Then others follow: Robert T. Creasey, of Texas, Assistant Secretary of Labor, Department of Labor; Henry G. Bennett, of Oklahoma, Technical Cooperation Administrator; Nelson A. Rockefeller, of New York, Chairman of the International Development Advisory Board.

Rockefeller's job is Chairman of the International Development Advisory Board.

Next is Thomas D. Cabot, of Massachusetts, Director for International Security Affairs.

Then we come to the nominations to boards, bureaus, commissions, and so forth. I call the attention of the Senators now present to the fact that we look at this list in vain to find one appointment from the great State of North Dakota.

First in the list of appointments to boards, bureaus, and commissions, we find a Californian, Lt. Col. William R. Shuler, of California, a member of the California Debris Commission.

Next we find Charles E. Wilson, of New York, Director of Defense Mobilization.

Next is John W. Gibson, of Michigan, a member of the Displaced Persons Commission.

Next is William C. Foster, of New York, Administrator of Economic Cooperation.

Next is Richard M. Bissell, Jr., of Massachusetts, Deputy Administrator for Economic Cooperation.

Next is Allen Valentine, of New York—that is the fourth appointment from New York in this list—Economic Stabilization Administrator.

Next is Stephen J. Spingarn, of New York—this is the fifth nominee from New York in this list, Mr. President—a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Next is Hugh W. Cross, of Illinois, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Next is John L. Rogers, of Tennessee, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Next is John D. Small, of New York—the sixth from New York—Chairman of the Munitions Board.

Next is George J. Bott, of Maryland, General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

Next is John Thad Scott, Jr., a member of the National Mediation Board.

Next is Sophie Bledsoe Aberle, of New Mexico, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Chester I. Barnard, of New York—this is the seventh from New York—member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Robert Percy Barnes, of the District of Columbia, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Detlev W. Bronk, of Maryland, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Gerty T. Cori, of Missouri, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Charles Dollard, of New York—that makes eight from New York—a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Robert F. Loeb, of New York—that makes nine from New York—a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Andrey A. Potter, of Indiana, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Lee A. Dubridge, of California, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Donald H. McLaughlin, of California, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Edward L. Moreland, of Massachusetts, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Next is Joseph C. Morris, of Louisiana, a member of the National Science Board, National Science Foundation.

Harold M. Morse, of New Jersey.

James A. Reyniers, of Indiana.

Elvin C. Stakman, of Minnesota. As I understand, he is quite a good friend of my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Minnesota, and was appointed, I believe, on his recommendation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the Senator from North Dakota state again the name of that distinguished citizen of Minnesota? I did not understand the name as he read it.

Mr. LANGER. It is Elvin C. Stakman.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Excellent.

Mr. LANGER. Yes, an excellent appointment.

Next is P. H. Yancey, of Alabama.

James B. Conant, of Massachusetts.

John W. Davis, of West Virginia.

Mr. President, John W. Davis left West Virginia 30 years ago. He has lived in New York for more than 30 years, and has practiced law there during that period. Yet, to keep the people from knowing that he comes from the State of New York, he is listed, because he was born in West Virginia some 60 or 70 years ago, as coming from that State. As a matter of fact, he is a New Yorker, has his office at 23 Broad Street, has been there all these years, and is labeled the No. 11 New Yorker.

Edwin B. Fred, of Wisconsin.

Paul M. Gross, of North Carolina.

George D. Humphrey, of Wyoming.

O. W. Hyman, of Tennessee.

Frederick A. Middlebush, of Missouri.

Charles E. Wilson, of New York. That is the twelfth appointment from New York.

Michael V. DiSalle, of Ohio.

Walter E. Cosgriff, of Utah.

Walter Lee Dunham, of Michigan.

W. Elmer Harber, of Oklahoma.

G. Edward Rowe, of Massachusetts.

William E. Willett, of Maryland.

Seth W. Richardson, of the District of Columbia.

Peter Campbell Brown, of New York—the thirteenth appointment from New York.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not true that Seth W. Richardson is a native of the great State of North Dakota?

Mr. LANGER. I wish to say to my distinguished friend that he is entirely mistaken. Seth W. Richardson is a native of the great State of Wisconsin. He came to North Dakota and played baseball there for a while, and at one time was admitted to the bar there.

Mr. HUMPHREY. In North Dakota?

Mr. LANGER. Yes. For over 30 years he has resided in the District of Columbia, and it will be noted that he is listed as being, not from North Dakota, but from the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not true that Seth W. Richardson did practice law for a period of time in the State of North Dakota?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; and he also practiced law in the great State of Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. LANGER. Minnesota is across the river from North Dakota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that, as was done in the case of John W. Davis, we change the listing of the residence of Seth W. Richardson, as it appears in the statement from which the Senator is reading, and have Mr. Richardson listed as coming from North Dakota. Then there would be an appointment from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, we have no authority to change the listing. If I could, I would do so, because Seth W. Richardson was one of the outstanding men of North Dakota, when he resided there. President Hoover appointed him Assistant Attorney General of the United States. But he came to the city of Washington, and he has been here now for more than 30 years. I want to treat him as I treated John W. Davis, who left West Virginia, and now lives in New York, and has lived there for more than 30 years, and now is from New York. Mr. Richardson left North Dakota 30 or 35 years ago, and has not been back there since then.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is not Seth W. Richardson, in the mind of the Senator from North Dakota, a very competent and able man?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; he is very able and very competent; he is one of the best officials in the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. His loyalty is beyond question, is it not?

Mr. LANGER. Absolutely; and his appointment is one of the best appointments ever made by a President of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from North Dakota is aware of the fact, is he not, that this is the same Seth W. Richardson who screened the employees of the State Department for their loyalty?

Mr. LANGER. I am very much aware of that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from North Dakota believes that Mr. Richardson was honest and patriotic and conscientious in performing that task, does he not?

Mr. LANGER. There is no question in the world about the patriotism, honesty, and loyalty of Seth W. Richardson.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator from North Dakota agree with me that Seth W. Richardson when appointed the head of a loyalty board for either the State Department or any other department, or when appointed the head of any antisubversives board—regardless of the department for which such a board might be appointed—would, if he found any Communists in that agency, be the first to expose them?

Mr. LANGER. Let me say to my friend that there is not a shadow of doubt about that. There is no one in the entire Government more able or more loyal or a finer citizen than Seth W. Richardson.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad to have the Senator's observation in that connection, because I agree with him that there is no one more able than Seth W. Richardson. It gives me real assurance to know that he was head of the Loyalty Board in that case; and I feel deep in my heart that he did an honest, conscientious job. Therefore, I can look with some ease of conscience at the personnel of that department.

Mr. LANGER. Let me say to my friend the Senator from Minnesota that, if Seth W. Richardson is appointed to any important position, I expect to vote for the confirmation of his nomination, and I expect to fight for it, because, as I have said before, Mr. Richardson is not only honest and capable, but he is patriotic and loyal and absolutely one of the finest public servants this country has ever had.

Mr. President, a moment ago I read the name of Peter Campbell Brown, of New York, the thirteenth appointee from New York appearing in this list.

Now I come to Mrs. Anna Eleanor Roosevelt, of New York, a representative of the United States of America on the Human Rights Commission of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. Her appointment is the fourteenth from New York in this list.

Then I come to the nomination of Irving Florman, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Bolivia—the fifteenth appointment in this list from New York.

Paul C. Daniels, of New York, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Ecuador. That is No. 16.

Walter S. Gifford, of New York, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Great Britain. That is No. 17.

In other words, of the four ambassadors appointed during all this time, three came from New York State. The other one, the Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Paraguay, Howard H. Tewksbury, came from New Hampshire.

We come now to the Diplomatic and Foreign Service. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the scores of nominations on this list, but shall merely say that not one of them comes from the great State of North Dakota, although, as I recently said, and proved, on the floor of the Senate, there are thousands of men and women in North Dakota who are capable of filling any one of these positions.

I again call attention to the fact that under Franklin Delano Roosevelt, six New Yorkers were in the Cabinet at one time, while the State of North Dakota has never, in its entire history, since it became a State in 1890, a period of 62 years, had an ambassador. We have had only one consul during all that time. He was appointed consul at Quebec.

A perusal of the names will disclose that the only appointments the State of North Dakota has, as shown by the Executive Calendar which is before the Senate today, and the nominations on which the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota, who is acting ably as majority leader, has asked me to permit to be confirmed, are of two little postmasters; and, under the law, those postmasters had to live in the State of North Dakota. Those two postmasters are Elmer L. Schielke, of McClusky, and Edward J. Sondag, of Sykeston. Both are very small towns.

I do not see on the Executive Calendar today anyone who is appointed to a policy-making department. I want to thank the distinguished acting majority leader for at least not taking postmasters from outside the State of North Dakota, for instance, from the State of Minnesota, and bringing them into the State of North Dakota. I remember that but a short time ago a man by the name of Tom Moody was brought in from Minnesota and ran for Governor of North Dakota. It was necessary to take the case to the Supreme Court in order to have him thrown out. Not satisfied with running the State of Minnesota alone, but an effort was actually made to put a man from Minnesota into office as Governor of North Dakota.

I might add, Mr. President, that the citizens of North Dakota are much more able than the citizens of Minnesota, if I may say so without disparagement to the great State of Minnesota, a State which I very much like. I think the distinguished Senator will agree with me that we in the State of North Dakota, time and time again, have furnished very able citizens to take jobs in the State of Minnesota. The people of Minnesota are intimately acquainted with the high caliber of men to be found in the State of North Dakota. I remember that, when the distinguished Floyd Olsen was elected Governor of Minnesota, he looked all over the State of Minnesota, trying as best he could to find a man whom he could trust to be his private secretary. Do you know, Mr. President, out of the great population of Minnesota, of, I think, a million and a half, as I now remember, Governor Olsen could not find one. So he came to North Dakota. There he hired his private secretary. A little later he looked around, and he called me. I was Governor at the time. He said, "I need a tax commissioner." Out of all the people in the State of Minnesota he could not find one who would make a good tax commissioner, and he appointed George E. Wallace, of Wahpeton, N. Dak. A few days later the Governor again telephoned me and said, "Governor, there are in northern Minnesota a million and a half acres of pine brush, State-owned land, and I must get someone who is smart enough and capable enough to take care of it. I do not have anyone in the State of Minnesota who is competent and whom I can appoint." So I said to him, "We have a man in McLean County by the name of Harry Dunbar." So Governor Olsen got Harry Dunbar from North Dakota to take care of the land.

A little later he again called me and said, "I am in terrible trouble. There is bootlegging of gasoline all over the State of Minnesota. I must find someone who will stop it." I said, "That is simple. We have a dozen men who will do it for you." He got George W. Griffith, of Burke County, N. Dak., who went to Minnesota and did a remarkable job of stopping the bootlegging of gasoline.

Governor Olsen realized the high character, ability, efficiency, and honesty of the men of North Dakota, and he again called me a few days later, and said, "We need a bank examiner in Minnesota." Out of all the thousands of accountants and bankers in the State of Minnesota he could not find one who was capable of being bank examiner of that great State. In North Dakota, in Grant County, there is a little town by the name of Carson, and in that town there was a banker by the name of Robert D. Berry. I recommended Mr. Berry to Governor Olsen, who appointed him to be bank examiner for the great State of Minnesota. A little further along, again he called me and said, "I need a man who can drive an automobile so that, when I go out for a ride, I know I am going to get there—a man who will not drive me into the ditch. I need a private chauffeur." Out of the million and a half people in the State of Minnesota he could not find one to drive his automobile safely and carefully, so he hired Morris Rose, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., to be his personal chauffeur.

Mr. President, without saying anything disparagingly of any other State, I may say that while I was Governor, a man by the name of Dave Nolan escaped from our penitentiary. He was serving a life sentence for murder. It took us 3 years to find him. And do you know, Mr. President, when we located him, in Arkansas, we found that he had been elected public printer of the State of Arkansas. [Laughter.] In other words, in Arkansas they recognize true merit. When Mr. Nolan was returned to the penitentiary of North Dakota to serve the remainder of his life sentence, it was necessary for the people of Arkansas to call a special election to fill the office of public printer of the State of Arkansas.

So I want to say to my distinguished friend and colleague here today, I am not going to object to the nominations on the calendar. I am delighted to know that Minnesota is not trying to put Minnesota men into office as postmasters in the State of North Dakota; and I am grateful for the little crumbs we get from the Democratic administration.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from North Dakota it appears that the process of elevation of prominent North Dakota citizens is by way of Minnesota. After hearing the very informative address of the Senator from North Dakota and learning that the distinguished former Governor of my State recruited all this splendid talent in North Dakota, I want to say, in the tradition of Floyd B. Olsen, an honorable man and a great governor, how grateful we are to the people of North Dakota for the talent they have shared with us. That was the original, I may say, of the Marshall plan; in a sense, the Marshall plan of the time. They were sharing the resources of the abundant and prosperous State of North Dakota with the good and, I may say, conscientious and sincere people of Minnesota. We are extremely grateful, and the Senator may be sure that if Minnesota can be helpful in securing any recognition for North Dakota in the upper eschelons of government, we shall be happy to do so.

Mr. LANGER. I thank my distinguished colleague; but the trouble is, he says one thing and does another. Last week there were vacancies on the Economic Stabilization Board. At that time, notwithstanding the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, four nominations were made, two from Minnesota, one from Montana, and one from South Dakota. Poor, poor North Dakota was left out. So I can only say that I hope the distinguished Senator will take a week off from his duties as Senator from Minnesota and will join me in being Senator from North Dakota, and during that time will help me get a member of the Cabinet, that we have never had; will help me get at least half a dozen consuls we have never had; will help me get some ambassadors, whom we have never had, and will help me get somebody into the policy-making divisions of the departments of the Government, whom we have never had. Minnesota has a proud record. The people of Minnesota have had men in the Cabinet, they have had consuls, they have had ambassadors. They have had everything that it is possible for them to have. Now I think they have two ambassadors, one of them to Cuba, Mr. Butler——

Mr. HUMPHREY. He resigned.

Mr. LANGER. And Mrs. Anderson, who is at present Ambassador to Denmark.

There has never been a man from the State of North Dakota on the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Judicial District. Minnesota has had as many as three at one time; South Dakota, two; Nebraska, two.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Minnesota for his offer of help. I accept it in the spirit in which it is offered. His office is next to mine, and I want to become better acquainted with him and find out how he does it for the State of Minnesota and whether he goes into the back door of the White House, as suggested the other day by the Senator from New Hampshire. I am going to ask the Senator from Minnesota to show me the back door. I do not know where it is. I always go to the front door.

In behalf of the people of North Dakota, I thank my distinguished colleague, and I assure him that I shall take advantage of his invitation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of William Jennings Bryan, Jr., of Los Angeles, Calif., to be collector of customs in customs collection district No. 27?

The nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The remaining nominations on the calendar will be stated.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask that the President be notified of all nominations confirmed today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified.

RECESS TO THURSDAY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, unless there be some further business to be transacted, I move that the Senate stand in recess until Thursday next at noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Thursday, February 15, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, Thou infinite and eternal God, we rejoice that in the annals of our national history we have the record of the life and character of many God-fearing souls who served their generation according to Thy holy will and of whose fame there will be no end.

We thank Thee for this day when we are privileged to call to mind and pay tribute to the memory of a great patriot in whose heart the fires of faith in God and man burned brightly and who placed his supreme confidence in the sanctity and abiding reality of the moral and spiritual order.

Grant that our beloved country may continue to have as its glorious aspiration and far-flung goal the coming of that blessed time when men everywhere shall walk together, unitedly and joyously, as brothers, on the highways of freedom and peace.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 8, 1951, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the House was considering the bill (H. R. 1612) to extend the authority of the President to enter into trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] offered an amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], the so-called escape-clause amendment. Mr. BAILEY's substitute appears in full on pages 1113 and 1114 of the daily RECORD of February 7, 1951. I made the point of order against that amendment on the ground that it was not germane and that point of order was sustained. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] then offered an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, containing the identical language of his first amendment with the exception of the heading which was altered to provide a specific amendment to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, instead of adding merely a new section to the bill under consideration. This amendment was germane. However, in the reading of it, page 2 of the amendment was misplaced. It was, I am informed, at the Clerk's desk. I am sure the Committee was aware that it was considering the language contained in the two pages of the Bailey amendment as originally offered. My friends on the other side of aisle accepted the amendment as a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, and it was agreed to by the Committee of the Whole and subsequently by the House on a separate vote.

Permit me to read that part of the amendment which was read by the clerk, and then read the second page which was not read:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska: Amend section 350 of the Tariff Act, as amended, by adding thereto the following subsections:

"SEC. 5. (a) If in the course of a trade agreement any product on which a concession has been granted is being imported into the territory of one of the contracting parties in such increased quantities or under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers in that territory of like or directly competitive products, the contracting parties shall be free, in respect of such product, and to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury, to suspend the concession in whole or in part, to withdraw or modify the concession or to establish import quotas.

"(b) Upon the request of the President, upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested party the United States Tariff Commission shall make an investigation to determine whether any article upon which a concession has been granted under a trade agreement to which a clause similar to that provided in subsection (a) of this section is applicable, is being imported under such relatively increased quantities or under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to a domestic industry or a segment of such industry which produces a like or directly competitive article.

"In the course of any such investigation the Tariff Commission shall hold hearings, giving reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I read the second page of the amendment which should follow at the end of section 7 of the bill:

Should the Tariff Commission find, as the result of its investigation and hearings, that serious injury is being caused or threatened through the importation of the article in question, it shall recommend to the President the withdrawal or modification of the concession, its suspension in whole or in part, or the establishment of import quotas, to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent or remedy such injury.

(c) When in the judgment of the Tariff Commission no sufficient reason exists for such a recommendation to the President it shall, after due investigation and hearings, make a finding in support of its denial of the application, setting forth the facts which have led to such conclusion. This finding shall set forth the level of duty below which, in the Commission's judgment, serious injury would occur or threaten.

In arriving at a determination in the foregoing procedure the Tariff Commission shall deem a downward trend of production, employment, and wages in the domestic industry concerned, or a decline in sales and a higher or growing inventory attributable in part to import competition, to be evidence of serious injury or a threat thereof.

Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] I feel that in all fairness to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] a correction should be made in the proceedings of the House, and I now ask unanimous consent that the proceedings whereby the bill H. R. 1612 was passed be vacated and that the language of the amendment I have just read be agreed to in toto as an amendment to the bill at the point it was intended, section 7 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have been consulted on this matter; so has the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] stated.

I do want to say this, however, for a very efficient reading clerk, that I saw the confusion of the many papers that were on his desk at the time this amendment was read, and I can readily understand how this mistake could have been made. I have no intention whatever of holding the reading clerk to blame.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I am not seeking to lay any blame at all, not for 1 minute, and what I have said and am saying is in no way to be construed as criticism of the clerk. It was not the fault of the clerk; it was just one of those errors that may occur when an amendment is presented to the clerk's desk consisting of two pages and the two pages are not attached.

Mr. REED of New York. I realize the gentleman was not making any such implication.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the proceedings whereby the House on February 7, 1951, ordered the bill H. R. 1612 engrossed, read a third time, and passed will be vacated. The amendment as read by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] is agreed to and the bill will be considered as engrossed, read a third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

There was no objection.

COMMUNIST PEACE COUNCIL

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the House to an attempt by the sneaking Communist traitors to use the proposal to draft 18-year-olds as a wedge to reach parents of young men with their propaganda designed to undermine the morale of our people for the benefit of the Kremlin-directed Communist conspiracy. I am in receipt of several petitions printed and circulated by the Southern California Peace Council. At the top in bold, black-faced type, they say, "I didn't raise my boy to be a soldier." This is followed by the usual Communist propaganda, and at the bottom the petition is addressed to the Congress and has room for only four signatures above the printed words "Southern California Peace Council, 326 West Third Street, Los Angeles 13, Calif."

The Communists are, of course, fully cognizant of the fact that many good citizens are concerned, as we all are, over the necessity of requiring our young men to spend considerable time in the Armed Forces. They are seeking to capitalize upon this concern by using it as a pretense to contact as many citizens as possible in order to spread their propaganda calculated to destroy faith in our Government, weaken our Armed Forces, and our determination to resist the aggression plotted by the imperialists in the Kremlin. We can see the propaganda on the petitions, but we know not what lies the Communists used to obtain the signatures. We can well imagine that those who signed will be indexed and cataloged for future softening up by the Communists.

Before coming here from Los Angeles, I received first a telegram and then a mimeographed letter from this so-called Peace Council. The communications denounced the draft and universal military training. They claimed that these proposals emanated from a Nazi general, and were so obviously the product of the Communist Party that I immediately forwarded them to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. At the same time, I sent an investigator to the address of the so-called Peace Council. He found there only a locked door with a paper on the outside, and the name "Southern California Peace Council" written on the paper. Apparently, this Communist brainchild was hastily conceived, and the nefarious propaganda was considered so important to the Communists that they started spewing it out before they had time to give their infant "front" organization even the outward appearance of legitimacy.

I am bringing this matter to the attention of the House because similar fake peace councils may be operating in other areas, at least it is a fair guess that if they are not, they soon will be; and the great, free American press, which effectively exposed the Stockholm Peace Petition, will render another service to the people by warning them not to be induced by the Communists into signing petitions that are not directed to the Congress in good faith by the instigators of the scheme, but are rather another attempt by the Communist traitors to make dupes of well-intentioned persons who for their own reasons are opposed to universal military training or the drafting of 18-year-olds. The Communists are, of course, against any American preparedness of any kind. They would like to see us weak and Russia strong. They would like to see us completely disarmed and the Communists fully armed. They have no objection to universal military training or the drafting of 18-year-olds by the Russian Red Fascists. They will not hesitate to capitalize on the slightest doubts of any of our citizens, or our sincere desire for peace, to try to convince us that we need only to lie down meekly like a good, little lamb, and we will be safe. Safe, of course, in fact, for them to slaughter. These phony peace councils must be exposed, and I hope the Attorney General will place them on the subversive list, where I am sure they belong, so that our press can tell the truth about this latest tactic of the agents of the enemy operating within our Nation.

I DIDN'T RAISE MY BOY TO BE A SOLDIER

The plan to draft 18-year-olds for 27 months of universal military service would affect every family in America.

We who are mothers desire peace, security, happiness for our children. We did not raise them to go to war.

We who are fathers fought in two wars which were supposed to bring peace and security to our children. We don't want them to go to war.

We who are young demand the right to live in the world our mothers desire, for which our fathers fought—a world of peace, of jobs, careers, marriage.

We who are children want no more bomb drills, no more fear. We want a world of hope and peace.

A little war in Korea has solved no problem in the world. It has added to all problems. A bigger Army, a bigger war, is not a better answer. Peace can be won only through honest negotiations by heads of state.

We can stop plans for the 27-month draft, a bigger Army, a bigger war, we can speak and we can sign for peace.

Your voice, your signature, can stop the 27-month draft, can stop war, can bring peace. Sign this petition. Ask your neighbors to sign, and forward it to your Congressman.

To the Congress of the United States:

We petition you to act for peace—not war. Defeat all plans for the 27-month draft of our youth for universal military service.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. McCARTHY asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Tuesday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ARMED FORCES TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to provide for the creation of a students' Armed Forces training program and for other purposes.

The primary purpose of this bill is to establish an Armed Forces training program which will utilize the existing plants and facilities of schools and colleges to the fullest extent practicable in providing preliminary military training—as well as technical, specialized, and other scientific training—to persons serving in the armed forces. Many schools and colleges possess plants and facilities today which are well adapted and can be made readily available for such training. The establishment of this program will substantially benefit the Government by eliminating the necessity and expense of constructing and maintaining numerous training camps, and will in addition enable many schools and colleges to continue to function under conditions which, by reason of the service of students in the Armed Forces, might otherwise force their closing.

In order to carry out the stated purpose of the bill, the Secretary of Defense is directed in general terms to create a Students' Armed Forces Training Corps, to establish units of the corps at schools and colleges which meet the requirements laid down by him, and to provide by regulations for its organization, operation, and administration. The admission standards and courses of instruction are to be prescribed by the Secretary, with one exception: It is specifically provided that if 18-year-olds are inducted they must be given preliminary training in uits of the corps for at least a full academic year before being assigned to other duty.

The Students' Armed Forces Training Corps is to be patterned as closely as possible after the Students' Army Training Corps created during World War I by order of the War Department. The Students' Army Training Corps program of World War I was initiated by placing certain colleges under military control on a contract basis, enlisting the students, and continuing them in regular army status with full pay. Vacancies subsequently occurring were filled by the colleges themselves on the basis of examinations and aptitude tests devised by the Army, and a central clearance arrangement made the surplus of one institution available for units at other institutions. During the brief period of its existence, about 10,000 members of the Students' Army Training Corps were transferred to various branches of the Armed Forces for active duty, and the program was universally considered a valuable and promising one.

Since under this bill the inclusion in the corps of all 18-year-old inductees is mandatory, it is not contemplated that the Students' Armed Forces Training Corps can be an exact replica of its World War I model. However, the basic organizational structure of the Students' Army Training Corps and the experience gained in its establishment and operation should prove to be of great value in providing for its present-day successor.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. DENNY (at the request of Mr. GRAHAM) was given permission to address the House today for 5 minutes, following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. MASON asked and was given permission to address the House on Monday next for 30 minutes, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. BUSBEY asked and was given permission to address the House today for 30 minutes, following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

TASK CONFRONTING OUR GOVERNMENT

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, as the chairman of the Illinois Republican delegation in Congress and as a Representative from the great State of Abraham Lincoln, I feel it incumbent upon me to say that the great task that lies before the Nation today is the task of changing the present government in Washington from a government of the bureaucrats, by the bureaucrats, and for the bureaucrats, into the kind of government that Lincoln was talking about when he defined our Government as a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. That is the great task that confronts this Congress today. May God give us the strength, the courage, and the fortitude to carry out that task.

READING OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday, February 22, 1951, Washington's Farewell Address may be read by a Member to be designated by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL GUARD MEN

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, it has recently been brought to my attention that members of the National Guard in many States are disturbed and irritated and this bitterness arises from the uncertainty of their position, but chiefly because private employers are denying increases in pay and promotion to National Guard men, using the excuse that these employees will soon be called into active service, and therefore will not be available for civilian work.

It is needless for me to point out that the morale of our National Guard troops is of vital importance to the welfare of our country. The National Guard constitutes the greatest organized force of trained troops we have in this country, many of them veterans of the last war, and they would constitute an important part of our first line of defense in the event of conflict.

To deny these men earned pay increases or promotions in their daily work because of selfish reasons, is in my opinion indefensible, in fact, despicable. In a sense, it is sabotage of our defense effort. It should bring down on the heads of such employers righteous anger and contempt.

Of what value are National Guard men or other men called into service whose enthusiastic belief in our American system of private enterprise has been destroyed or impaired even before they reach the fighting line. If they are not fighting for their employers as well as their country, themselves, and their families, who are they fighting for?

It does not seem possible to me that there can be many such American business or professional men, so irresponsible, so selfish, and so unpatriotic, as to penalize these volunteers for performing their patriotic duty.

Those who employ members of the National Guard or other young men about to be called into service should recognize that these employees are the representatives of their employers and the companies for which they work on the fighting line, and they should help carry the rifles and equipment these men expect to carry into battle by honoring them, encouraging them, and holding out the promise of rewards when they return.

A man or woman who volunteers to protect his or her country under the threat of war has developed a sense of responsibility of the highest order and has attributes that are bound to be successful in the business or professional world.

Employers should be proud of the fact that those who are called into service should be recognized for what they are, the defenders of their employers, and have placed an obligation on their employers hard to repay.

Every association of business and professional men in this country should make every effort to arouse enthusiasm for our National Guard members and every employee called into service should urge their members to reward their patriotism in every possible way while they are awaiting the call, and agree to welcome them back into their old jobs or better ones when they are released from service.

On the uncertainty as to when our Organized Reserves are to be called out I suggest that the Army, Navy, and Air Force can give commanding officers some information as to when the National Guard or other units can expect to be called into active service, and thereby reduce the uncertainty even in these uncertain times.

While I realize it presents deep consideration and presents difficulties, it seems to me that the Department of Defense or the Army can at least make a broad general statement which will allay fears and clarify the situation without giving information or aid to the potential enemy.

[From the Boston (Mass.) Globe of January 21, 1951]

BAY STATE GUARD ASKS PENTAGON END UNCERTAINTY

The Massachusetts National Guard yesterday appealed to Secretary of Defense Marshall to be informed as to the approximate date it may be called to active Federal service.

The request was contained in a resolution adopted by the National Guard Association of Massachusetts at its sixty-fourth annual convention at the Copley Plaza.

Some 1,100 officers of ground and air components voted unanimous approval after Brig. Gen. Edward D. Sirois, president, declared guardsmen are being discriminated against in civilian jobs.

The request to the Pentagon was based on the appeal that it would end unnecessary uncertainty and undue hardship.

"We should be able to plan our lives accordingly," said Sirois, the Twenty-sixth (Yankee) Division's artillery commander. "We have a right to know when our services are to be expected."

Asserting that guardsmen are confused, don't know what their role is to be, Sirois heatedly told the convention that some had lost jobs, been replaced, or passed over in promotion, "simply because we are subject to active duty call."

The Massachusetts National Guard, he said, was ready to perform in an emergency, "although few, if any, of us relish the prospect—but we are ready if needed."

TIMETABLE IS URGED

"We are not complaining, just begging that our lives are not further complicated," he said. "A timetable should be prepared. If mobilization is to be delayed, we should know about it. Our lives have been more complex and involved than the average citizen's."

Governor Dever, who left his hospital bed to address the convention, upheld General Sirois' opinion.

"You should be told what the future months hold in store for you," the Governor said. "I have little patience with those who would resist the call of need in this hour of peril. The fact of your membership in the guard is proof you are willing to serve if the need is present. But you should be informed of any prospect of the need."

Maj. Gen. William H. Harrison, Jr., State adjutant general, described the future for the guard as "a foggy uncertainty."

Reminding commanders to be ready when the call comes, he urged "utmost zeal in pursuing your recruiting campaigns so when induction comes, the measure of our industry will be judged by the completeness of our formations."

General Harrison issued a warning to all unit commanders to hasten the completion of a screening process ordered last week by the National Guard Bureau.

STATE AIR GUARD PLAN HINTED

"It is important that all personnel who will not be available or physically unacceptable for induction into active Federal service be eliminated from the Massachusetts National Guard as soon as possible," General Harrison declared. He disclosed that he attended a Washington military conference on Thursday.

Possibility that the Massachusetts National Air Guard may soon be federalized was indicated by Maj. Gen. Willis H. Hale, commanding general of the First Air Force.

After informing the convention that all enlisted personnel of the Air Force Reserve in the United States will be subject to induction starting tomorrow, he remarked in an aside "that it wouldn't be a bad idea to shine up your buttons, too." This suggestion was directed to Brig. Gen. Lyle Halstead, commander of the 102d Fighter Wing, a State guard unit.

General Sirois and Col. Otis M. Whitney, commanding the 182d Regimental Combat Team, vice president, were reelected. The new second vice president is Col. Edward H. Bradford, Jr., commanding officer of the 102d Maintenance and Supply Group, M. A. N. G.

Speakers at the banquet were Rev. Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., vice president of Georgetown University who is frequently consulted by Washington as to affairs in Russia because of his first-hand knowledge of that country, and Maj. Gen. Ellard A. Walsh, president of the National Guard Association of the United States.

Other convention speakers were Senator Richard L. Furbush, president of the Massachusetts Senate; Maj. Gen. William I. Rose, commander of the 26th Division; Maj. Gen. Charles G. Helmick, commanding general of the New England Subarea, United States Army, and Col. Edgar C. Erickson, chief, administrative office, National Guard Bureau.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENNY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

COLLEGE TRAINING FOR 18-YEAR-OLDS

Mr. DENNY. Mr. Speaker, the problem of the draft of 18-year-olds is facing us squarely. We cannot dodge it, we must meet it without flinching. It is foreign to our way of thinking, this compulsory calling of young men to the armed service, but there is one thing that is worse, that is recalling the veteran who has served and suffered in the last war. He probably is married, may have several children, and has made a place for himself in our economic life. His return to the military life means a psychological and material loss of considerable consequence.

There is no way to compromise. The 18-year-old must be called or not called. The drastic step must be taken because of manpower shortages and for the safety of our country. The young unattached and unfettered man must go.

There is, however, a way in which the harsh step of snatching him away from his course of education and his family may be softened if not improved. During my service in the last war as an inspecting officer, I had occasion to visit some 50 college training detachments of the Air Force all over the eastern and southern parts of the country.

These training detachments operated at colleges between the basic training and the classification of pilot candidates. The boys underwent a college curriculum of 4 to 8 months and at the same time received military instruction and some pilot instruction from Air Corps officers. In my wide experience it was a successful experiment. It continued the education of the young men. It interested them to such an extent that it encouraged a large percentage of them to return to college after their military experience. It helped their morale and it made their families feel better about their future. Incidentally, it helped the colleges, particularly the smaller ones, in a time of critical need.

Basic military training is at best a drudge. It is not a full time job nor a full day's work. The old Army practice, since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, is to get the boys up about 5 a. m., give them calisthenics now known as P. T., followed by close order drill for discipline and alertness. Then they indulge in obstacle races and an hour or so of class work. This program cannot go on for a full day. It is not physically possible. So the students are largely left to their own devices for perhaps half of the day. This is when their morale and their morals suffer, and they really take a beating after many weeks of the same.

My proposal, therefore, and I think it is a practical one, is that the basic training for 18-year-olds be combined with the same number of months of college training for those who are fitted for it and continued school training for those who have not reached that standard. There will be many who are not prepared for active college training. That this training be accomplished simultaneously at a number of colleges, preferably smaller ones, to be selected and designated by the Armed Forces. This plan will continue the education of the young man, give him a taste of college curriculum, help his morale, satisfy his parents, and materially help the colleges which are selected.

The cost will not be great. A full college tuition need not be paid. The groups of trainees will be small so that a minimum of military instructors will be on duty. The overhead of a large camp will be eliminated. The comfort, housing, feeding, and care of the boys will be immeasurably better. They will not be introduced to military life in large expanses of primitive, dusty, and uncongenial barracks. Life will be more pleasant and above all they will be constructively occupied. It is my firm belief that if this plan is followed we will turn out better soldiers and better men. The sheep will be separated from the goats and all of them will be developed, as our pilots were in the last war, into the finest young men in the Nation.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

COMMUNISTS IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, every patriotic American not only wants to know, but is entitled to know, what is wrong with the so-called loyalty program of President Truman which keeps Communists in our Federal Government and at the same time coddles and protects them. The one who is more guilty than anyone else is the President himself, because he is the one who set up the present program and prescribed the standards under which the Loyalty Review Board has to operate under his Executive Order No. 9835 of March 21, 1947.

Mr. Speaker, I went to great lengths to point out the inconsistency of the President's loyalty program in my testimony as a witness before the Committee on Un-American Activities on August 5, 1948. The Truman program reminds me of the thief who hollered "Thief, thief" and pointed to another man running down the street so the people would not detect his guilt. The President should know all about "red herrings" as he has been on friendly terms with them for years, and I now charge that his loyalty program is by far the biggest "herring" ever to be pulled before the eyes of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, this is but the first of a series of speeches I propose to make during the next few months that will draw the iron curtain of secrecy and expose those who are guilty of protecting Communists in our Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, the recent conviction of William Remington is cause enough to make the Congress of the United States give some sober thought and study to the cause and cure of Communists and their fellow travelers in Government service. In my speeches on this subject I will give the names and present the documented proof on those in high places in Government and out of Government who have been guilty of protecting Communists in Government. I will also recommend a remedy whereby no person of questionable loyalty will remain in Government. Then if the President is not willing to rectify his mistakes, I will lead a fight to have the Congress withhold every penny of appropriation from the United States Civil Service Commission and the Loyalty Review Board.

I also propose to show that these same people who have been protecting Communists in Government have been the arch conspirators in another program. They have attempted either to have dismissed from Government service people who are best qualified to deal with this loyalty program or to see that they are put away into what is generally referred to around Washington as "the deep freeze." I will show that there would never have been any necessity of spending millions upon millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in setting up a Loyalty Review Board if the Commissioners of the United States Civil Service Commission had fulfilled their obligations under the law and taken proper and adequate measures against those they knew to be disloyal to our country. Instead they yielded to outside pressure to have individuals rated eligible when they knew them to be ineligible.

Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at the Loyalty Review Board, set up by President Truman under Executive Order No. 9835, of March 21, 1947. First, the President appointed a board of 12 people, under Mr. Seth Richardson, none of whom were qualified for the position because not a single one of them had worked in the field of subversive activities, particularly that of communism. Secondly, the President absolutely prevented the Board from effectively carrying out a real loyalty program because of the restrictions in the standards or yardstick under which they have to work. For instance, on page 4 of his Executive order in section 1 under Part V, Standards, is the following:

1. The standard for the refusal of employment or the removal from employment in an executive department or agency on grounds relating to loyalty shall be that, on all the evidence, reasonable grounds exist for belief that the person involved is disloyal to the Government of the United States.

I wish to call your attention to the last part of section 1, which reads as follows:

Reasonable grounds exist for belief that the person involved is disloyal to the Government of the United States.

You will note that the word "is" denotes present tense and proves to be the joker in the prescribed standards.

Strictly speaking, an employee could be ever so disloyal, and so found by the Loyalty Poard within an agency where he is employed, but when he appeals to the Loyalty Review Board of the United States Civil Service Commission he could contend to the Board that at that very moment he is entirely devoted and loyal to the Government of the United States, and under the present standards the Loyalty Review Board would necessarily render a judgment finding the employee not presently disloyal. One can readily see that the Loyalty Review Board is handicapped under the President's standards as set forth in his Executive Order No. 9835.

For 4 years Mr. Seth Richardson was Chairman of the Loyalty Review Board and it was Mr. Richardson who passed judgment in the Remington case. Mr. Richardson, after 4 years as Chairman, cannot say he was unaware of the shortcomings of Truman's loyalty program, because with all the facts of the William Remington case before him he was the one who said that the record did not prove Remington "presently" disloyal. Not once is there any public record that Mr. Richardson went to the President and pointed out the deficiencies in the loyalty program and demanded they be remedied. Nor is there any public evidence that a single one of the Commissioners of the Civil Service Commission ever informed the President that the loyalty program was inadequate and unworkable.

For his faithful adherence to a program that was doomed to failure from the very start, Mr. Richardson was promoted to the chairmanship of the Subversive Control Board, set up under the McCarran Act. In his place the Civil Service Commission has appointed a former governor and Senator from the State of Connecticut, Hiram W. Bingham. The position in which Mr. Bingham finds himself is not an enviable one.

Unless he succeeds in having the loyalty standards or rules modified, at least to the extent of "reasonable doubt," he will find himself saddled with all the unfavorable publicity that is bound to follow the exposure of other "Remington" cases, because there surely are others that will come to light in the very near future.

It becomes more apparent each day that the President has no intention of amending his loyalty order. Confronted more and more with specific examples of the failure of the Civil Service Commission and its Loyalty Review Board, the President recently created the Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights with Admiral Chester W. Nimitz as Chairman. In the text of the order creating this new Commission the President said:

The Commisson will be expected to report on the effectiveness and fairness of the Government's loyalty and security programs. In doing this, the Commission may wish to inspect individual case files, and it will be authorized to do so to whatever extent it may determine to be necessary.

The Congress of the United States may as well consider its face slapped. Time and time again committees of Congress have been refused access to loyalty files by an order of the President; yet the same President creates a commission comprised of people with absolutely no experience or background in combating subversive activities, and makes available to them the identical records denied the Congress.

The Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights has a year to report. Is this another device of the President to protect people in Government whose loyalty is questionable beyond a reasonable doubt? This is the sixth group set up, one on top of the other, that has worked in favor of the Communists in Government when the Civil Service Commission should have handled the job in the first place, to say nothing of the millions upon millions of dollars these inadequate and ridiculous programs have cost the taxpayers. Thes groups are:

First. Civil Service Commission.

Second. Special Loyalty Board inside Civil Service Commission.

Third. Loyalty Rating Board inside Civil Service Commission.

Fourth. President's Temporary Commission on Employee Loyalty—Executive Order No. 9806.

Fifth. Loyalty Review Board—Executive Order No. 9835.

Sixth. Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights.

Government employment is a privilege, not a right. The method by which the President can eliminate all this needless red tape and really rid the Government of all undesirables, if he is sincere in this direction, is to change his directive and use the exact words of former Commissioner Arthur S. Flemming in his testimony before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on December 12, 1940, that "all doubts are resolved in favor of the Government."

As I stated earlier, I intend this to be the first of a series of talks on the operation of the Civil Service Commission's Loyalty Review Board and the President's loyalty program. Later, I intend to show case after case of persons of questionable loyalty receiving the blessing of the Civil Service Commission for Government positions. I intend to show case by case where the Loyalty Review Board reversed the loyalty boards of various Government agencies and compelled those agencies to retain employees the agencies believed to be disloyal. I intend to show that, while Congress was doing everything within its power to stop the operation of communism, the Civil Service Commission was constantly easing Communists and fellow travelers into Government jobs.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief observation?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. It is a fact that Congress has met with strong resistance in its endeavor to drive the disloyal out of the Government service. The Seth Richardson Loyalty Review Board played this sorry role. The conviction of Remington is simply further testimony as to the worthlessness of this Board, which at all times manifested a quick and a warm regard for the Reds.

In my opinion, the gentleman is performing a very fine service. The "whitewashing" of Remington by the Seth Richardson board meant that he was restored to his $10,000-a-year job in the Commerce Department, he was paid $10,000 back salary, and he was able to collect $10,000 from a broadcaster who broadcasted the testimony of Miss Bentley to the effect that Remington was a Communist. That is what the Seth Richardson board did.

If this Seth Richardson so-called Loyalty Board ever manifested the slightest interest in ridding the Government of Reds that were packed in all of the departments or ever reflected the slightest sympathy for the will of the Congress to get them out, the record does not show it.

Mr. BUSBEY. I would like to ask my very good and patriotic colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] what he thinks of the President's action in moving Mr. Seth Richardson, after being in charge of the Loyalty Review Board for 4 years, over to being Chairman of the Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights?

Mr. COX. I have no comment to make on the action of the President, but I do say it was impossible for Seth Richardson, coming from the Davies' set-up, to perform a patriotic duty as head of the Loyalty Review Board.

Mr. BUSBEY. I thank the gentleman from Georgia for his comment.

As the Honorable F. EDWARD HÉBERT, former member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, once said:

> What does it profit us if we shout down Communists from our roof tops while we let our front doors open to all who would destroy that for which we stand?

In my speeches I intend to bring to the American public the true deceit and chicanery of administration stalwarts in high places who, while bleeding for the rights of the disloyal employees, arbitrarily remove, or discipline, those who believe it is a sacred privilege and not a right to work for the American Government.

To be denied the privilege of public employment, one has almost to prove high treason; thus countless decisions of the agencies are overruled by the Review Board by reason of lack of evidence. It smacks of a giant conspiracy to perpetuate the machinations of the architects of disaster who have reduced us to our present unhappy state, while at the same time it lends lip service to administration puppets who proudly point to this inept loyalty program as proof of their aversion to communism. Any board the President establishes by Executive order, in my opinion, is doomed to failure because if he were sincere in wanting to rid the Government of Communists and fellow travelers, he would have selected Board members who were qualified and experienced in the subversive field. The President's entire program is so much smoke screen, whitewash, and red herring, using as a front many well-meaning citizens who undoubtedly are well qualified in many fields, but are too naive to understand and comprehend the Communist conspiracy that has engulfed half a world through the very tactics we condone here.

The fight against communism, like charity, begins at home, and it will prove of little avail to shake our fist at Joe Stalin in Moscow while we shake the hand of his agents in Washington.

The case of William Remington, who was convicted in Federal court last week, after having been cleared by the Civil Service Commission on at least two occasions, is just the first of similar cases which will be brought to light in the near future. In my next speech I will start to name names, and show the American people for the first time who the individuals are who kept these undesirables in office when they knew they were not eligible for employment. It is high time the public is informed of those individuals who have betrayed their country and broken their oath of office.

I am making this first speech today because I have been informed that there will be a meeting of the entire membership of the Loyalty Review Board tomorrow, February 13, 1951, and this next remark is directed to them. The Loyalty Review Board should unanimously adopt a resolution tomorrow demanding that the President change the standards under which they now have to work, thereby preventing the handing down of another Remington decision, when the person involved is found ineligible for Government employment. It is hard for me to understand why, in 4 years of operation, not a single member of the Board, including Mr. Seth Richardson, the former Chairman, not once has demanded that the President change his standards. I would even volunteer to rewrite the one sentence for the President and guarantee, if the Loyalty Review Board would adhere to it as diligently as they do to the present one, not a single Communist or Communist sympathizer would remain on the Government payroll.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND INFLATION

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, today is the anniversary of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, one of the foremost Americans of all time.

During my seven terms as a Member of this House, I have thought at times the way for me to be difficult indeed.

In fighting enemies of the GI and the veteran both at home and in Washington, there have been moments of great frustration for me, especially when these enemies were so influential and powerful.

In striving for fair pensions for elderly people, I have suffered moments of anguish during temporary setbacks due to greed and selfishness of the obstructionists.

Now, I find the greatest opposition in my entire career arrayed against my crusade for lower food prices at the time the cost of all food items are the highest on record.

But I take heart as I thumb the pages of history and find that Abraham Lincoln had more trying days than most of us will ever witness.

I find that during the Civil War, prices of food and clothing also hit inflationary heights. Like today, the profiteers and the chiselers were active, realizing huge gains at the expense of the people.

Yes, Lincoln had his hands full with these characters, and with many right in his own Cabinet and his own party. They never lost an opportunity to stand in the way of his desire to see progress.

Lincoln was not only among the foremost Americans, he was the greatest Republican of all periods.

I am and always have been, always will be an Abraham Lincoln Republican. My faith in the Republican Party will never be shaken as long as Lincoln is looked upon as its all-time leader, and as long as his principles are followed by rank and file Republicans. I hope we will never stray too far off his beaten path.

I have tried to pattern the Hall program of improving GI rights after the Lincoln policy of fair dealing to the soldiers and veterans of the Civil War period.

As an example, at the time Congress enacted the Servicemen's Adjustment Act of World War II, better known as the GI bill, I demanded that the homestead laws, enacted by the Lincoln administration, which made farm acres available to veterans of that day, be put back on the books.

I would like to have seen our GI's and veterans of World War II taken care of, as Lincoln's homestead laws provided farms and homes for Civil War soldiers.

If Lincoln were President today, he would insist that provisions of my program in the interest of our servicemen, and our veterans, be made the law of the land.

Lincoln would also back me up in my fight to get lower food prices for the folks back home.

FORRESTAL PROGRAM COMPARED WITH PRESENT DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in analyzing the defense needs of our country, I think it is important to look back upon the so-called Forrestal report and see what was recommended then as a minimum for the condition of the country at that time and then compare it with the present program for our national defense.

The Forrestal program is so called because Secretary of Defense Forrestal indicated that these were the minimum requirements requested by the Chiefs of Staff—Generals Bradley and Spaatz and Admiral Denfeld—to meet the probable missions of their Departments at that time, which was in 1948. The details on this program are available for public inspection in the Senate Appropriations Committee hearings—supplemental appropriations—fiscal year of 1948, on H. R. 6226. It should be borne in mind that we were not then at war, as we are today. When the Forrestal program is compared with the 1951 program, we find that some very interesting facts are revealed.

As shown on pages 4 and 5 of the hearings on H. R. 6226, under the Forrestal program the Navy was to have a total of 12 carriers—3 of which were Midway class—and 10 light carriers, primarily for antisubmarine warfare and close support. Under the 1951 budget plus the first and second supplementals, a total of 10 large carriers, or 83⅓ percent of the Forrestal program, and 15 light carriers, or 150 percent of the Forrestal program were authorized. The present program, as indicated by public announcement, calls for 12 large carriers and 15 light carriers or 100 percent and 150 percent, respectively of the Forrestal recommendations. Secretary Forrestal further recommended a total of 24 carrier air groups and 12 antisubmarine warfare squadrons to man these carriers. Of this number 12, 50 percent, carrier groups, and 10, 87 percent, antisubmarine warfare squadrons were authorized in the 1951 program, while the present build-up calls for 15, 62.5 percent, groups and 15, 125 percent antisubmarine warfare squadrons. The Forrestal program further included a total of 34 patrol squadrons and 31 marine fighter squadrons of which 27, 79 percent, patrol squadrons, and 18, 58 percent, Marine squadrons were authorized for 1951. Present build-up calls for 34, 100 percent, patrol squadrons, and 21, 68 percent, Marine squadrons.

An inspection of the pertinent documents indicates that operating aircraft for the Navy are not being provided for in 1951 on the basis of the recommendations which were made even in peacetime. The Forrestal report recommended 10,687 operating aircraft for the Navy in accordance with the Finletter board report to the President, Survival in the Air Age, and the Brewster board report to the Congress, National Aviation Policy, Senate Report No. 949, Eightieth Congress, which recommended a total supporting inventory of 14,500 aircraft. The 1951 program, however, authorized 7,512—70 percent—aircraft, while the present program calls for 8,000—75 percent—operating aircraft.

Secretary Forrestal also recommended a total of 663,000 military personnel for the Navy including marines—see page 5 of H. R. 6226 hearings. The 1951 budget program authorized a total of 689,000 Navy personnel and 166,000 marines. The number of Marine divisions and supporting air wings recommended by Forrestal was four of each while both the 1951 budget and the present program authorized two of each, or 50 percent of the Forrestal program.

With regard to the Army, Secretary Forrestal recommended 12 regular divisions—see page 103 of H. R. 6226 hearings—while 1951 authorizations included 16—133 percent, divisions and present programs indicate 20 divisions, 167 percent. Army military personnel under the Forrestal program was originally set at 669,000 and included in its requirements support to an Air Force of 401,000 personnel. The Air Force raised the personnal figure from 401,000 to 502,000 based on, first, a change in strategic concept—emphasis on strategic air; second, requirements for a continental radar warning net; and third, assumption of functions previously handled by the Army. The Army requested that its 669,000 figure be increased to 837,000 to complement the 502,000 Air Force figure. Otherwise the Army would have had to reduce its combat forces in order to support the increased size of the Air Force; for increasing the number of Air Force bases, for instance, necessitates extra Army personnel as they furnish the military protection for the bases, extra quartermaster personnel, and so forth. The 1951 program authorized a total of 1,265,000 men or 151 percent while present programs build up to 1,600,000 or 191 percent of the original Forrestal recommendation.

For the Air Force, Secretary Forrestal recommended a total of 70 groups, based on the Finletter and BREWSTER reports of a 20,541-plane program. For 1951 a total of 68 groups, 97 percent, was authorized. These groups have been increased in size and are now called wings. Heavy bomber groups have been increased from 18-plane groups to 30-plane wings. Present programs call for a total of 90 wings, 130 percent, or considering the expansion just mentioned, a total of 150 old groups or 214 percent. As regards military personnel for the Air Force, Secretary Forrestal recommended 502,000. The 1951 program authorized 651,000 or 130 percent, while present build-up calls for 1,000,000 or 197 percent.

On December 6, 1950, I spoke in the House on a program for defense in the present emergency and said, among other things, that I believed that the over-all manpower requirements were closer to 10,000,000 men in the armed services than the 3,000,000 which were once mentioned. I, naturally, do not have all of the technical knowledge required for any authoritative answer to any of the defense needs of our country, but I feel it my duty to express my opinion on the basis of the available facts. These are serious times and I do not have the right to remain silent when I believe that our defenses are not adequate.

On the basis of the facts available to me, which are the same facts available to anyone who will study the public records and read the newspapers, it is my belief that, first, our mobilization is progressing slowly; second, our plans for future expansion are not nearly as large as they should be; and third, our plans for naval air power—including planes and modern carriers—are extremely inadequate. I hope that I am wrong on all of these points; but, on the basis of the data which I have cited, it appears that my position is well founded. It seems strange, indeed, that in important categories the Forrestal peacetime program is not being met or even planned to be met in the present emergency of actual war. What seems stranger still is that the marines and naval air power still lag far behind the Forrestal recommendations, while in other aspects of our defense those recommendations are greatly exceeded. All of this is in the face of the great record made by the marines and by naval air power in Korea. A public explanation of such planning would seem appropriate.

FALSE PROPAGANDA FOR AN IMPROPER PURPOSE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, when, on January 3, 1951, the House, by a vote of 245 to 178, adopted the rules of the Eighty-first Congress with the Cox amendment to subsection (2) (c) of rule XI, it determined the procedure under which proposed legislation is to be considered by the Eighty-second Congress.

Then why discuss that action at this time?

Because, and only because, for the past 15 years certain individuals and groups, sometimes in an effort to put over their own legislative measures, sometimes for financial gain, and sometimes apparently because of their own innate meanness, have time and again sought by various statements and unsound conclusions to discredit individual Members of Congress and the Congress itself, and there is no reason why we should cravenly submit.

These are two ways of meeting this propaganda. One is to remain silent, trusting to the good sense and sound judgment of the American people to correctly evaluate this class of propaganda. Unfortunately, mixed with these vilifications, are the statements and conclusions of honest individuals, uninformed or misinformed as to the facts.

It is also true that some hearing or reading these slanderous or libelous statements never hear them refuted, hence conclude they are true.

One way of combating this vicious propaganda which is designed to discredit the people's Congress is, with all the publicity that can be obtained, from the well of the House, to challenge false statements and unjustifiable conclusions. The latter method has been the one which I have followed.

Because, and only because, some columnists, some editors, and some radio commentators have knowingly and with malice aforethought made untrue statements as to what the Congress did on the 3d day of January, as to the purpose and effect of that action, permit me to set the record straight.

Let it again be said, as was above stated, some of those commenting upon the action of the House, and to whom reference is here made, are just misinformed, and no doubt gave voice to their honest opinions.

One such instance is that of the editor of the Grand Rapids Herald, published at Grand Rapids, Mich., who wrote the editorial captioned "A backward step," the evident purpose being to show that a small group in Congress adopted rules which prevent consideration of proposed legislation desired by a majority of that body.

Mr. Thomas L. Stokes is a dyed-in-the-wool, so-called liberal, propagandist. He seems to feel that if the New Deal-Fair Deal went on the rocks the country would be ruined. He can be counted on to consistently attack the judgment of any and every Republican, or, for that matter, southern Democrat, who ventures to oppose any part of the so-called social program of the spenders. He writes so convincingly that at least on one occasion during the last campaign he frightened himself.

Just preceding the November election he made a tour of the country and in one article wrote that a two-party system was essential if the interests of the people were to be served. He then went on to bemoan the fact that the Republicans were not stronger politically, were not offering an effective resistance to the administration's policies. Mr. Stokes with his merchandise, for he sells words and ideas, as well as criticism, has been consistently lambasting every Republican who did not without hesitation accept his views—who did not support his version of the New Deal.

He may have been disturbed by the failure of Republicans to reply to his criticism. He may have become apprehensive at the success of his propaganda. He may, in a thoughtful moment, have become fearful of the effect upon the country if the program which he had so strenuously advocated became a reality. In any event, for a reason which he never, so far as I have been able to learn, explained, besought Republicans to stand up and fight. That, for once, was much-needed advice. It was not followed, and Republicans failed to win control of the Eighty-second Congress.

To show the inaccuracy of certain statements which have been made, the unsoundness of conclusions which have been drawn from what the House did on January 3, permit me to make certain statements of fact.

During the Eighty-first Congress 14,988 legislative proposals—bills and joint resolution—were introduced in the Senate and House. Of these proposals, the Congress enacted into law 1,081 private bills, 905 public laws, and 4 or 5 additional public acts, were, as of the 6th of January, still in the hands of the President.

As of the 8th of January, 287 legislative proposals have been introduced in the Senate, 1,244 in the House.

It is obvious to the most superficial thinker that the individual Members of Congress cannot read, consider, and form sound judgment as to each of the proposals introduced, which when filed are referred to the proper legislative committee.

It is equally obvious that the Congress, in order that it may intelligently legislate, must set up some sort of screening organization. One might as well think of taking to the mill the unthreshed field of wheat.

One radio broadcaster argued that each of the 435 Members of the House should be given a chance to vote on legislative matters, that every Member should be willing to go on record for or against a bill.

The uninformed might understand that the gentleman meant that every Member of the House should have an opportunity, and should be required, to vote on every legislative proposal introduced. Of course that is not what he meant, for he knows very well that many bills are introduced in practically every session, with no expectation on the part of the author that they will ever be favorably considered or reported by the committee to which they are referred, much less be favorably considered by the House.

He also knows that such procedure, if bills were to be considered in the order in which they were introduced, would bar adequate consideration of bills reported out by the Ways and Means Committee, by the Committee on Appropriations. Without the enactment of tax and appropriation bills, the Government could not continue to function; hence, the necessity of the screening process.

Imagine the situation which would exist if there was no screening procedure, individual Members clamoring for recognition, for immediate consideration of a pet bill. Confusion and worse, the House a bedlam.

TO AID THE CONGRESS, LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS HAVE ALWAYS BEEN SCREENED

At one time the Speaker of the House made the determination as to whether and when a bill or resolution was to be considered by the House.

On January 18, 1924, the House adopted rule XI (c) which for 25 years, with but a minor amendment in 1931, gave the Rules Committee, until January 3, 1949, the authority and the duty of determining when and in what manner a bill should be considered by the House. This was the rule under which the Eightieth Congress functioned.

The authority granted was not absolute. There were several limitations upon the power granted.

The two most important were carried in rule XXIV, subsections 4 and 7, which provides for Calendar Wednesdays, and rule XXVII, which provides for bringing a bill before the House by discharge petition.

Briefly, rule XXIV, subsections 4 and 7, of the Eightieth Congress, provide that on Wednesday of each week "after the unfinished business has been disposed of, the Speaker shall call each standing committee in regular order and then select committees, and each committee when named may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar, and if the Speaker shall not complete the call of the committees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the last bill under consid-

[1] RULE XI (c)

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-first Congress, together with all applicable provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, be, and they are hereby, adopted as the rules of the House of Representatives of the Eighty-second Congress, with the following amendment included therein as a part thereof, to wit:

Paragraph (2) (c) of rule XI is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) The Committee on Rules shall present to the House reports concerning rules, joint rules, and order of business, within three legislative days of the time when ordered reported by the committee. If such rule or order is not considered immediately, it shall be referred to the calendar and, if not called up by the Member making the report within seven legislative days thereafter, any member of the Rules Committee may call it up as a question of privilege and the Speaker shall recognize any member of the Rules Committee seeking recognition for that purpose. If the Committee on Rules shall make an adverse report on any resolution pending before the committee, providing for an order of business for the consideration by the House of any public bill or joint resolution, on days when it shall be in order to call up motions to discharge committees it shall be in order for any Member of the House to call up for consideration by the House any such adverse report, and it shall be in order to move the adoption by the House of said resolution adversely reported notwithstanding the adverse report of the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker shall recognize the Member seeking recognition for that purpose as a question of the highest privilege."

eration: Provided, That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on 2 days, it shall not be in order to call up any other bill until the other committees have been called in their turn." [1]

SEC. 4. After the unfinished business has been disposed of, the Speaker shall call each standing committee in regular order and then select committees, and each committee when named may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar, and if the Speaker shall not complete the call of the committees before the House passes to other business he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the last bill under consideration: Provided, That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on 2 days, it shall not be in order to call up any other bill until the other committees have been called in their turn.

SEC. 5. After 1 hour shall have been devoted to the consideration of bills called up by committees, it shall be in order, pending consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, or, when authorized by a committee, to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union to consider a particular bill, to which motion one amendment only, designating another bill, may be made; and if either motion be determined in the negative, it shall not be in order to make either motion again until the disposal of the matter under consideration or discussion.

SEC. 6. On the first Tuesday of each month after disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, the Speaker shall direct the Clerk to call the bills and resolutions on the Private Calendar. Should objection be made by two or more Members to the consideration of any bill or resolution so called, it shall be recommitted to the committee which reported the bill or resolution and no reservation of objection shall be entertained by the Speaker. Such bills and resolutions, if considered, shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. No other business shall be in order on this day unless the House, by two-thirds vote on motion to dispense therewith, shall otherwise determine. On such motion debate shall be limited to 5 minutes for and 5 minutes against said motion.

On the third Tuesday of each month after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, the Speaker may direct the Clerk to call the bills and resolutions on the Private Calendar, preference to be given to omnibus bills containing bills or resolutions which have previously been objected to on a call of the Private Calendar. All bills and resolutions on the Private Calendar so called, if considered shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Should objection be made by two or more Members to the consideration of any bill or resolution other than an omnibus bill, it shall be recommitted to the committee which reported the bill or resolution and no reservation of objection shall be entertained by the Speaker.

Omnibus bills shall be read for amendment by paragraph, and no amendment shall be in order except to strike out or to reduce amounts of money stated or to provide limitations. Any item or matter stricken from an omnibus bill shall not thereafter during the same session of Congress be included in any omnibus bill.

Upon passage of any such omnibus bill, said bill shall be resolved into the several Committees are called not alphabetically but seriatim in the order in which they appear in the rules.

The rule further provides that—

On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule—unless the House, by a two-thirds vote on motion to dispense therewith, shall otherwise determine.

The above quotation from rule XXIV (4) (7)—Calendar Wednesday, Eighteth Congress—shows conclusively that the chairman of a committee which had acted favorably upon a bill had as much authority, when so authorized by his committee, to force consideration of a bill, favorably reported by that committee, as he had under rule XI (c)—House Rules and Manual, page 385—adopted by the Eighty-first Congress, with just two exceptions. He was limited under the rule of the Eightieth Congress in his right to demand consideration of a bill on which the Rules Committee had filed an adverse report and to Wednesday of each week, while the rule of the Eighty-first Congress provided that he could call up a bill adversely reported or not reported 21 calendar days after a bill had been referred to the Committee on Rules.

There was another way by which any Member of a majority of the House could force consideration of a bill by the House. That method was provided by rule XXVII (4), Eightieth Congress—motion to discharge a committee.

Under this rule "any Member may present to the Clerk a motion in writing to discharge a committee from the consideration of a public bill or resolution which has been referred to it 30 days prior thereto." [2]

(MOTION TO DISCHARGE A COMMITTEE)

SEC. 4. A Member may present to the Clerk a motion in writing to discharge a committee from the consideration of a public bill or resolution which has been referred to it 30 days prior thereto (but only one motion may be presented for each bill or resolution). Under this rule it shall also be in order for a Member to file a motion to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of any resolution providing either a special order of business, or a special rule for the consideration of any public bill or resolution favorably reported by a standing committee, or a special rule for the consideration of a public bill or resolution which has remained in a standing committee 30 or more days without action:

Provided, That said resolution from which it is moved to discharge the Committee on Rules has been referred to that committee at least 7 days prior to the filing of the motion to discharge. The motion shall be placed in the custody of the Clerk, who shall arrange some convenient place for the signature of Members. A signature may be withdrawn by a Member in writing at any time before the motion is entered on the Journal. When a majority of the total membership of the House shall have signed the motion, it shall be entered on the Journal, printed with the signatures thereto in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and referred to the Calendar of Motions To Discharge Committees.

On the second and fourth Mondays of each month except during the last 6 days of any session of Congress, immediately after the approval of the Journal, any Member who has signed a motion to discharge which has been on the calendar at least 7 days prior thereto, and seeks recognition, shall be recognized for the purpose of calling up the motion, and the House shall proceed to its consideration in the manner herein provided without intervening motion except one motion to adjourn. Recognition for the motions shall be in the order in which they have been entered on the Journal.

When any motion under this rule shall be called up, the bill or resolution shall be read by title only. After 20 minutes' debate, one-half in favor of the proposition and one-half in opposition thereto, the House shall proceed to vote on the motion to discharge. If the motion prevails to discharge the Committee on Rules from any resolution pending before the committee, the House shall immediately vote on the adoption of said resolution, the Speaker not entertaining any dilatory or other intervening motion except one motion to adjourn, and, if said resolution is adopted, then the House shall immediately proceed to its execution. If the motion prevails to discharge one of the standing committees of the House from any public bill or resolution pending before the committee who signed the motion to move that the House proceed to the immediate consideration of such bill or resolution (such motion not being debatable), and such motion is hereby made of high privilege; and if bills and resolutions of which it is composed, and such original bills and resolutions, with any amendments adopted by the House, shall be engrossed, where necessary, and proceedings thereon had as if said bills and resolutions had been passed in the House severally.

In the consideration of any omnibus bill the proceedings as set forth above shall have the same force and effect as if each Senate and House bill or resolution therein contained or referred to were considered by the House as a separate and distinct bill or resolution.

SEC. 7. On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule unless the House by a two-thirds vote on motion to dispense therewith shall otherwise determine. On such a motion there may be debate not to exceed 5 minutes for and against. On a call of committees under this rule bills may be called up from either the House or the Union Calendar, excepting bills which are privileged under the rules; but bills called up from the Union Calendar shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union. This rule shall not apply during the last 2 weeks of the session. It shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion for a recess on any Wednesday except during the last 2 weeks of the session:

Provided, That not more than 2 hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure called upon on Calendar Wednesday, and all debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill, the time to be equally divided between those for and against the bill:

Provided further, That whenever any committee shall have occupied one Wednesday it shall not be in order, unless the House by a two-thirds vote shall otherwise determine, to consider any unfinished business previously called up by such committee, unless the previous question has been ordered thereon, upon any succeeding Wednesday until the other committees have been called in their turn under this rule:

Provided, That when, during any one session of Congress, all of the committees of the House are not called under the Calendar Wednesday rule at the next session of Congress the call shall commence where it left off at the end of the preceding session.

Under this rule it was also in order "for a Member to file a motion to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of any resolution providing either a special order of business, or a special rule for the consideration of any public bill or resolution favorably reported by a standing committee, or a special rule for the consideration of a public bill or resolution which has remained in a standing committee 30 or more days without action."

The rule further provided: [4]

A comparison of the provisions of rule XXIV (4) (7) of the Eightieth and of the Eighty-first Congress providing for Calendar Wednesday shows they are identical in words and punctuation. Under either, the chairman of a committee, when so authorized, could call up a bill for consideration by the House.

A comparison of rule XXVII (4) adopted by the Eightieth Congress and rule XXVII (4) adopted by the Eighty-first Congress relating to the discharge motion shows they are identical in words and punctuation.

The whole argument that the rules of the Eightieth and preceding Congresses acted as a gag, were reactionary, and that rule XI (c) of the Eighty-first Congress made it easier to get legislation to the floor of the House, hence was more liberal, ignores the fact that the discharge petition was always available to force consideration of proposed legislation, and that in the Eighty-first Congress if the action of the Rules Committee was not favorable, the individual Member, in order to receive consideration for his pet measure, had also to run the gantlet of the chairman and the majority of the legislative committee to which his bill was referred.

Members with experience also know that if, for example, I should send a bill the terms of which would be acceptable to the members of the committee to which it was referred, that bill would finally make its appearance, if it appeared at all, under the name of some member of the committee who belonged to the majority party.[5]

The rules of the Eightieth, the Eighty-first, and of the Eighty-second Congress provide the same method whereby a majority of the House could and now can, when so desired, force consideration of a legislative proposal by the House.

So it is inaccurate to say, as some have said, that the action of the House in rejecting the rule which was used in the Eighty-first Congress, in adopting the rule of the Eightieth Congress, was, as contended by the editor of the Grand Rapids Herald, "a backward step," or, as argued by Thomas L. Stokes, that there was a "blockade again on in Congress," or to charge, as did the A. F. of L. News of January 9, the Machinist of January 11, and the CIO News of January 8, that the Eighty-second Congress, on January 3, took action which deprived Members of an opportunity to consider and vote on legislative proposals; that the Congress "gagged" 'tself.

Using rules XXIV (4) (7)—Calendar Wednesday—and XXVII (4)—discharge petition—which were identical in both the Eightieth, the Eighty-first, and the Eighty-second Congress, a majority of the House, whenever so disposed, can, and since 1924 always could, bring before it for consideration and action any legislative proposal which has been introduced through either bill or joint resolution.

Permit a few quotations which misstate the effect of what the House did. Referring to the action of the House on January 3, when it refused to adopt the rules of the Eighty-first Congress and went back to the rule which had been in force during the 24 years preceding January 3, 1949, Thomas L. Stokes wrote:

It is, therefore, somewhat embarrassing that a coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats in our House of Representatives has just delivered a smacking blow to democracy. This was done on the opening day of the new Eighty-second Congress by restoring to the Rules Committee the arbitrary power to pigeonhole bills approved by the appropriate legislative committee and deny the House the right to vote on them.

That statement is not true, as Mr. Stokes well knew, and as anyone reading the provisions of the rules which have just been quoted can easily determine for himself.

Mr. Stokes further wrote:

Again a handful of men can thwart democracy in the House.

If, by democracy, the gentleman means the right of a majority to legislate, once again he is in error.

Permit me again to point out any time a majority of the House wants to consider and adopt legislation, it can do so and two roads are wide open. The legislation can be called up by a committee chairman on Calendar Wednesday—a majority of the House membership can force consideration by a discharge petition.

This article by Mr. Stokes received approval by the A. F. of L weekly news of January 9, in the following words:

YOU'RE SO RIGHT, MR. STOKES

WASHINGTON.—Tom Stokes, syndicated columnist, called the action of Republicans and Dixiecrats in restoring the House Rules Committee's power to pigeonhole legislation "a smacking blow to democracy."

He remarked that such reactionary conduct in the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress had helped in the reelection of President Truman in 1948.

Labor unions told the story to their members through their union newspapers, as they are telling now of repeal of the 21-day rule and its meaning.

This is not very helpful to Republicans in their effort to win back labor votes.

The CIO News followed the same line in its article on pages 1 and 3 of January 8.

Referring to the same subject the Machinist of January 11, page 8, commented:

In their first major action the reactionary coalition killed the 21-day rule. In so doing it shall be decided in the affirmative, the bill shall be immediately considered under the general rules of the House, and if unfinished before adjournment of the day on which it is called up it shall remain the unfinished business until it is fully disposed of. Should the House by vote decide against the immediate consideration of such bill or resolution, it shall be referred to its proper calendar and be entitled to the same rights and privileges that it would have had had the committee to which it was referred duly reported same to the House for its consideration:

Provided, That when any perfected motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of any public bill or resolution has once been acted upon by the House it shall not be in order to entertain during the same session of Congress any other motion for the discharge from that committee of said measure, or from any other committee of any other bill or resolution substantially the same, relating in substance to or dealing with the same subject matter, or from the Committee on Rules of a resolution providing a special order of business for the consideration of any other such bill or resolution, in order that such action by the House on a motion to discharge shall be res adjudicata for the remainder of that session:

Provided further, That if before any one motion to discharge a committee has been acted upon by the House there are on the Calendar of Motions To Discharge Committees other motions to discharge committees from the consideration of bills or resolutions substantially the same, relating in substance to or dealing with the same subject matter, after the House shall have acted on one motion to discharge, the remaining said motions shall be stricken from the Calendar on Motions To Discharge Committee and not acted on during the remainder of that session of Congress.

[4] On the second and fourth Mondays of each month, except during the last 6 days of any session of Congress, immediately after the approval of the Journal, any Member who has signed a motion to discharge which has been on the calendar at least 7 days prior thereto, and seeks recognition, shall be recognized for the purpose of calling up the motion, and the House shall proceed to its consideration in the manner herein provided without intervening motion except one motion to adjourn.

[5] RULE XI (c), EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

The Committee on Rules shall present to the House reports concerning rules, joint rules, and order of business, within three legislative days of the time when ordered reported by the committee. If such rule or order is not considered immediately, it shall be referred to the calendar and, if not called up by the Member making the report within seven legislative days thereafter, any member of the Committee on Rules may call it up as a question of privilege and the Speaker shall recognize any member of the Rules Committee seeking recognition for that purpose. If the Committee on Rules shall adversely report, or fail to report within 21 calendar days after reference, any resolution pending before the committee providing for an order of business for the consideration by the House of any public bill or joint resolution favorably reported by a committee of the House, on days when it shall be in order to call up motions to discharge committees it shall be in order for the chairman of the committee which reported such bill or joint resolution to call up for consideration by the House the resolution which the Committee on Rules has so adversely reported or failed to report, and it shall be in order to move the adoption by the House of said resolution adversely reported, or not reported, notwithstanding the adverse report, or the failure to report, of the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker shall recognize the Member seeking recognition for that purpose as a question of the highest privilege. Pending the consideration of said resolution the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the said resolution shall have been fully disposed of (p. 359, House Rules and Manual, 81st Cong.).

it restored the power of the Rules Committee to pigeonhole any legislation its reactionary majority doesn't like.

Another misleading editorial is that from the Farm Union, which reads as follows:

Congressmen are outdoing thmselves to approve reactionary legislation and undo what little good the Eighty-first Congress accomplished. During the first day's session on January 3, this Congress voted to restore the power of the Rules Committee so that 6 members of that 12-member committee can stymie any measure even if every other Member of both House and Senate favors it.

Farmers Union delegations which are pouring into Washington at the rate of about 75 a week, are embarrassing their Congressmen by asking why they voted to restore the power of this committee which, year after year, bottlenecked legislation in the House even when the majority favored it. Varying answers are given to these farmers from the grass roots who are getting a big dose of double talk from their elected representatives.

Mr. Stokes and those responsible for similar statements should know better.

In a different category is the Grand Rapids Herald editorial. The Herald editor is misinformed.

That editorial merely states that the present means "of forcing a bill to the floor cumbersome and difficult of execution." That is a matter of opinion. But they are no more cumbersome or difficult than was the so-called 21-day provision rule of the Eighty-first Congress.

As propaganda, it is well written. As information for the unadvised reader, it is misleading.

The editorial also states that—

The Rules Committee is intended to be a "traffic control" group whose function is to funnel legislation to the floor in an orderly manner. If it worked that way, it would be well.

Thus, the editorial acknowledges a traffic control is needed. As to whether it worked well, is a matter of opinion. The editorial is correct in stating that in previous years, time and again a majority of the Rules Committee's 12 members have kept the House from considering legislation recommended by a legislative committee. The Herald admits a "traffic cop" is necessary and there was always a way if a majority of the Members desired to bypass the Rules Committee. The Rules Committee never has had, it has not now, the power to keep a bill from coming on the floor of the House, either on a Calendar Wednesday or by discharge petition.

The gentleman who wrote that editorial just took a running hop, step, and jump to reach his conclusion.

Apparently all of the critics who contend that the Eighty-second Congress gagged itself by the adoption of this rule overlooked the cold, hard fact that a real gag can be, though it never has been, applied by the majority leadership. Recognition of a Member rests with the Speaker. If the majority leader and the Speaker decide upon a party policy or program of legislation and the Speaker should refuse to recognize any Member advocating any other program or legislation, the House has no remedy, so far as I know, other than the removal by party action of the majority leader—removal of the Speaker by House action.

Perhaps that might be done, but at the moment I know of no way of doing it, nor is there any likelihood that either the majority leader or the Speaker would attempt to apply such a gag.

Speaking, or thinking, of gags, the change in the rules made by the Eighty-first Congress would permit the chairmen of standing committees, when after 21 days and no action on the part of the Rules Committee, to call up a bill for consideration. Action by the House was, of course, subject to the limitation that the chairman of a committee must first obtain recognition from the Speaker. It was possible and sometimes it happened that more than one chairman was seeking recognition. It was then the prerogative of the Speaker to give preference in recognition. Thus the Speaker had the power to delay consideration of a bill; as for example, the FEPC, which the leadership did not want brought up.

Today, as always, the majority of the House membership can force consideration of action on any desired legislation.

On the third day of January, two methods of providing for consideration of proposed legislation were before the House. Presumably, each Member of the House voted for that method which he considered more desirable, more efficient. It was a matter of opinion and there is no reason to criticize the vote of any Member.

Neither is there reason for Members or non-Members to continue to insist that on that day the House took "a backward step," or that there was a "blockade again on in Congress," or that there was delivered a "smashing blow to democracy," or that the membership was gagged.

Inaccuracy and vituperation are but evidence, sometimes proof, of the inaccuracy of statements—the unsoundness of an argument.

Let us have less of propaganda designed unfairly, unjustly, to discredit the Congress, the Members of Congress.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman, the present-day Abraham Lincoln of Illinois.

Mr. VURSELL. Of course, the gentleman realizes that any time this Congress wants to pass legislation that 218 Members signing a petition——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is the discharge rule. That is rule XXVII.

Mr. VURSELL. Yes. There can be no gag rule as long as we have that provision. The facts are, and my observation in Congress has been, that you need a strong gate to hold back crackpot legislation. That gate has done a good job through the Committee on Rules. But, the point I wanted to call to the attention of the gentleman and ask him if he thinks I am right, is this——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman is always right.

Mr. VURSELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And I thank him for the explanation, lucid and brief, of what I spent 10 minutes in trying to state.

Mr. VURSELL. But here is a better point that appeals to me. I am satisfied that when they changed the rules in the Eighty-first Congress, it cost the taxpayers of this country half a billion dollars during the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Half a billion?

Mr. VURSELL. Maybe a billion dollars.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Maybe. But, what is a billion or two to a spending, wasteful administration?

Mr. VURSELL. But, with the people crying for economy, with the lack of courage on the part of some of us, Republicans and Democrats alike, when the pressure groups come after us, it is absolutely necessary to get back to the old rule. I voted not to do away with it, and with pride I voted to go back to it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

ASSISTANCE TO THE REPUBLIC OF INDIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 56)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I recommend that the Congress provide assistance to the Republic of India to meet the food crisis which now confronts the people of that country.

The people of India are in desperate need of emergency assistance from this country in meeting their food problems.

A series of natural disasters—earthquakes, floods, droughts, and plagues of locusts—greatly reduced the 1950 grain crop in India. The result has been to impair the ability of India to feed the population in its major cities and in many rural areas.

The average Indian food consumption is little more than half of our own. Grain constitutes more than three-quarters of the Indian diet. India has a large and effective rationing system, through which a large portion of the Indian population receives some or all of its necessary food grain supplies.

One hundred and twenty-five million people are covered by the rationing system. Some 45,000,000 depend almost entirely upon their Government ration for their food-grain supplies. Already the Government of India has found it necessary to cut the standard grain ration from 12 ounces to 9 ounces a day and take other drastic measures to meet the growing distress. Grain reserves have reached a dangerously low point.

Total grain requirements for ration distribution this year are estimated by the Government of India at about 9,000,000 long tons or 336,000,000 bushels. To maintain the rationing system, even at a level below last year's, the Government of India finds that it will have to import close to 6,000,000 tons in 1951. India is procuring almost 4,000,000 tons of this total through the use of its own foreign exchange resources. This grain is to be purchased in Australia, Argentina, Burma, and other countries. It includes about 1,500,000 tons of grain which India is procuring for cash from this country and Canada in accordance with its quotas under the International Wheat Agreement.

Procurement of the remaining 2,000,000 tons—about 75,000,000 bushels—which India estimates it will need, presents a serious problem. This grain will have to come in large measure, if not entirely, from this country. The Government of India has requested the United States to make this amount available, with shipment to begin as soon as possible. India finds that it does not now have funds available to pay for this amount, and yet, if action is not taken, there may be a real danger of famine in India.

We cannot turn a deaf ear to India's appeal. Our friendship for the people of India and our traditional concern for human suffering impel us to take every reasonable step we can to alleviate mass hunger and distress. Furthermore, the needs of the people of India have a special claim upon our sympathies at this time.

India is the largest of the new nations of Asia which have attained independence since the end of World War II. Following the voluntary withdrawal of the British in 1947, the Indian people adopted a constitution and began their existence under it, as a sovereign democratic republic, on January 26, 1950, a little more than a year ago. India's constitution, which is similar to our own, provides for universal suffrage and for the protection of its citizens in a way akin to our own Bill of Rights. The people of India are striving earnestly to establish representative government and democratic institutions as a unified and independent nation.

Like any nation which has just achieved independence, India is confronted with great difficulties—difficulties which have been aggravated by the crisis in Asia caused by the aggressive forces of Communist imperialism. The present food crisis, if permitted to continue, would magnify these difficulties and threaten the stability of India.

It is important to the free world that the democratic institutions which are emerging in India be maintained and strengthened. With a population of almost 350,000,000 people, India has substantial mineral resources and important industries. Its continued stability is essential to the future of free institutions in Asia.

I recognize that there are important political differences between our Government and the Government of India with regard to the course of action which would most effectively curb aggression and establish peace in Asia. However, these differences should not blind us to the needs of the Indian people. These differences must not deflect us from our tradition of friendly aid to alleviate human suffering.

It is not our objective in foreign affairs to dominate other nations. Our objective is to strengthen the free nations through cooperation—free and voluntary cooperation based on a common devotion to freedom. Our actions have demonstrated our adherence to this objective throughout the world. It is natural that the Indian people should turn to us for aid in meeting the threat of famine that now confronts them. We should meet their appeal in the spirit which guides our relations with all free nations.

I am confident that the American people and their representatives in Congress will respond to this urgent call for help. Already, numerous voices from all over the country have urged the Government to send food; and a number of members of both parties in the Congress are strongly supporting this popular demand.

I have had the executive departments concerned make a careful study of our ability to meet the Indian request. We do not have an oversupply of food grains. Our current carry-over of grain stocks is not excessive for a critical period like the present. Nevertheless, from a supply standpoint it is possible for us to make available up to 2,000,000 tons of grain without reaching the danger point. Inland transportation and other facilities to bring the grain to shipside will present some difficulties in light of other heavy demands. To provide sufficient ocean transportation to get the grain to India in time, it will be necessary to take some ships from our reserve fleet and recondition them. These ships, on their return voyages, can also help to relieve the shortage of shipping which now impedes the flow of scarce materials to this country.

The Indian Government finds that it is not now able to pay cash for the additional 2,000,000 tons. It is, however, prepared to pay, and will pay, the very substantial ocean freight charges. India has limited foreign-exchange reserves and will have a somewhat unfavorable balance of payments this year. It is planning to use the major portion of its reserves, beyond the necessary cover for its currency, on a long-range economic development program. It is, of course, of major importance that India develop its resources and provide a better economic base for its citizens, many of whom live in dire poverty. Unless India can undertake such a program, its economic troubles will increase, the standard of living of its people will continue to decline, and there will be no end to its history of recurrent famine.

In view of these factors and the pressing need for immediate assistance, it seems desirable to make a substantial portion of the requested grain available promptly on a grant basis, with India paying for the cost of transportation. This initial grant will avert the imminent danger and provide time to explore in greater detail the need for the balance of the Indian request and to determine the best way of supplying the amounts needed.

I, therefore, recommend that the Congress at this time authorize the full amount requested by the Indian Government, but that it appropriate funds now only for the first million tons, deferring the appropriation of funds for the balance until the situation has been further clarified.

If the Congress adopts this program, I propose that a mission be sent to India under the Economic Cooperation Administration to observe the distribution of the grain and to assist in carrying out the program. This mission would make an on-the-spot appraisal of the full extent of the Indian needs. It would examine other supply possibilities and the terms upon which additional grain should be supplied from the United States.

As in the case of other foreign aid programs, we would expect our representatives in India to be given every opportunity to observe the distribution of the grain and to be sure that the aid we are supplying is distributed fairly. We would also expect that the Indian people be kept informed through full and continuous publicity as to the source of the grain. Similarly, we would expect the Government of India to deposit in a special account local currency equivalent to the proceeds from the sale in India of the grain we supply on a grant basis. This account would be used for the development and improvement of the Indian economy.

As the Congress is aware, this is the practice we have followed in those countries which have received aid under the programs of the Economic Cooperation Administration. In the case of India, such counterpart funds would offer a splendid opportunity for the improvement of Indian agriculture, the development of important natural resources and industries, and other projects of benefit to the people of India. We would also expect the Government of India to do all it can to expand supplies and otherwise to lessen the danger from crop shortages in the future.

The purpose of this program is to meet the current emergency in India and to stimulate measures to forestall such crises in the future. It does not constitute a precedent for continuing to provide food to India on a grant basis or for providing similar aid for other countries.

I strongly urge that the Congress take immediate steps to put this program into effect. It is within our means. Human lives depend upon our taking prompt action. Shipments must begin by April if this food is to reach India in time to meet the present emergency.

In this critical time in the affairs of the world it is vital that the democratic nations show their concern for the well-being of men everywhere and their desire for a better life for mankind. But words alone are not sufficient. We must implement our words by deeds. We must counter the false promises of Communist imperialism with constructive action for human betterment. In this way, and in this way only, can we make human liberty secure against the forces which threaten it throughout the world today.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 12, 1951.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States,

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rabbi Harry J. Kaufman, Beth Sholom Congregation, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Sovereign of the Universe: In these challenging days our hearts are turned to Thee in prayer.

Be Thou with those who guide the destinies of our Republic.

Shepherd them with Thy wisdom that their judgments may be true and pure.

Grant them of Thy love that they may know the heart of all the people.

Send before them Thy pillar of light, to unite all Thy children in finding the road to enduring peace.

By Thy grace and manifold blessings Thou hast made this land the chosen of all nations.

Help us to remember that if we be chosen, it is not for privilege but for responsibility, not to be served but to serve, not alone to gain liberty but to grant it.

O Heavenly Father: Let be heard Thy word speaking to America through the Prophet even as Thou didst speak to ancient Israel.

I the Lord have called thee in righteousness and have taken hold of thy hand and kept thee and set thee for a covenant of the peoples, for a light of the nations; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the dungeon and those that sit in darkness out of the prison house. (Isaiah 42: 6.)

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LINCOLN DAY ADDRESS

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting oriental ideas concerning the development of the soul of man was that which compared it to the lotus, a sort of a water lily of the east. With its roots embedded in the unlovely but gently nurturing mud at the bottom of a stagnant lake, the lotus pushes itself upward to the sunlight, to emerge gloriously above the surface of the lake—a pure white flower; the very antithesis of that from which it sprang.

The divine chemist who builds the souls of men sometimes takes the most unfortunate environments, the worst apparent marital unions, and the most sordid appointments of life to create for a waiting world, in the extremity of need, a man with all the mental and spiritual qualities to lead a people out of all the perils they have ignorantly and selfishly created for themselves, a spiritual Moses able to lead them to the promised land of freedom and greater achievements.

There is also another eastern legend which states that, due to the idea that man lives many lives, each life being just another day in the divine school of life, he eventually, at the close of his life experiences, graduates from that school with the spiritual degree of master.

With this dué preparation, he goes forth into the world as a master of life, to teach and lead his brethren in the world the more perfect way of a full mental, moral, physical, and spiritual liberty. As they are able to grasp and follow his teachings, they follow the stars of their destinies. If they do this, they become more like the master, as did the boy in Hawthorne's tale, the Great Stone Face. Should they not be able to understand his message, they sometimes crucify the master or murder him.

If the mythologies of the east had no other message to give us, they might still be of worth in pointing a moral and adorning a tale. Possibly we lost something of great value when we forgot the beautiful tales they told of the struggles of man to attain divinity, in the similitude of the fully burgeoned lotus.

Perhaps, in the modern urge to condition men to an unlovely regimented existence, we have forgotten the fact that in the souls of all men there is a force which, when fully developed, gives such men a very special ability to lead mankind out of slavery to freedom, from darkness to light. When such stresses come, such men spring into evidence as suddenly and spectacularly as did Athena when she sprang fully armed from the head of Jove to do combat for the gods on high Olympus.

Such a great soul was Abraham Lincoln. He was born of mediocre parents, as we are apt to rate them. He lived in squalid surroundings. He was even denied the benefit of a public school. He had no cards to a public library; no entrance into school clubs or debating groups; no college nor fraternal organizations; no membership in any learned organizations, which a college or university degree might have enabled him to join.

Abraham Lincoln was self-taught. His compositions, for be it remembered he was a creator, were written with a piece of charcoal, while lying flat on his stomach before the simple fireplace of the family's log hut.

It is very easy for me to picture in my own mind the image of the great Creator of all that is, the great Thinker, brooding over this simple fallow soul, whispering into his waiting ear the great messages he was afterward to give to his countrymen, and pointing the way to lead a slave race to the freedom of the great day.

Evil must die. The sacred scriptures of all nations proclaim this. It is the basis of every lesson of life. It is the foundation of history, of logic, poetry, and all the arts. Only the good shall finally be perpetuated. From the beginnings of the fire mist through all the trials and tribulations of man; from that day when the blood of murdered Abel cried to the Lord God from the ground where Abel lay, down to the mass murders of Stalin, the modern Genghis Khan, with the mountains of the skulls of his murdered fellow countrymen remaining the chief mementos of his crime-scarred existence; all these must yet pass, with only the good, the beautiful, and the true remaining. The lines of battle are clearly drawn. Only sophistry may confuse the dividing line.

And there is that in the soul of man which immediately recognizes the lines of battle, if he has not conditioned himself to disregard truth for self-aggrandizement. Men instinctively know what is wrong, what lifts us upward to the stars, and what drags so many millions of us to despairful depths. Not more knowledge is what we need, but more action.

Abraham Lincoln lived and wrought at a time when he was needed most. Perhaps no other man could have accomplished his task; for, after all, God is the great conservationist. He rarely equips two men to do the same job. Back of the great debates between Douglas and Lincoln was the finger of God, pointing to the physically unprepossessing Lincoln, saying: "This is my beloved son, hear ye him."

Due to human selfishness, the greatest stumbling block between God and man, America had erred. They had dragged the black man from his home and people in the jungles of Africa, had imported him to America in hell ships, and had sold him on the block like cattle and sheep. They had enslaved him for pelf in the cotton fields of the South. His cries of anguish rose to Almighty God until He determined the time was ripe for the epiphany of the Great Emancipator, the friend of all mankind, the savior of the Union, Abraham Lincoln.

The battle was grim between the forces of evil and those of good. Lincoln was in peril every moment as he came to Washington for his inauguration. Public sentiment was dangerously divided as to the rights and wrongs of slavery. On the one hand was the rights of the property holder; on the other was the God-given spirit of freedom for all mankind. Which was to conquer? Lincoln chose the right; the eternally right. He espoused the right of all men to self-determination, their right to choose and work out their own destiny, without let or hindrance of creed, caste, or color.

The tides of battle swayed this way and that. There were many dark days. Tradition has it that Lincoln spent much time in prayer, seeking the same guidance in extremity Christ had sought in the garden of Gethsemane, asking for wisdom to guide his people to victory for the right.

Finally victory crowned the banners of the North. As the tides of battle finally turned, and being fully cognizant of what would be the aftermaths of war, Lincoln made his historic journey to the battle-scarred field of Gettysburg. On the way, free for a few moments from the burdensome cares of State, he jots down on a piece of scrap paper a few notes of that which was to be the greatest speech of all history, a masterpiece of English diction, and the finger pointing the way to the designs of the Almighty for the after-war period. How tragic those designs were not followed. What evils resulted from their being forgotten in an upsurge of worship of pelf and self-aggrandizement.

Peace at last. But a troubled and suspicious peace. Money-grubbers from the North seeking to perpetuate and magnify the feud between brethren. Pelf against magnanimity. Separation against brotherliness.

What might the great Lincoln not have achieved in healing the gaping wounds between the North and the South had he not been struck down with the bullet of a crazed murderer? One of the greatest faults of a modern society, even yet, is that we permit dangerous, unbalanced misfits to range about freely, until the fatal result of such a mistaken course of action becomes evident in the murder of innocents, the needless sacrifice of lives worth a thousand times more to society than the warped and crooked souls of the killers. Far transcending the rights of the individual is the right of society to protection against the unlimited freedom of the mentally unbalanced.

The immortal Lincoln was thus struck down, when America still needed him greatly, and the mediocrity thus projected into the seats of the mighty was not able to fully complete the regeneration of America from the wounds sustained in the Civil War. The South would have quickly recovered from the animosities engendered from an armed conflict, even though they were the losers. Their resentment against the rule of the carpet-baggers from the North still smolders. Can you not realize what stern action Lincoln would have taken against the crimes of these gentry?

Every visitor to Washington, seeing the Lincoln Memorial for the first time, is hushed in soul, and becomes immediately reverent. Even the taxi driver, whose constant familiarity with historic Washington tends to make him somewhat blasé, becomes as hushed and reverent as his passenger. What a most tremendous force has spiritual greatness. And on the other hand, what a promise and earnest of the future it is, when on occasions like this we are daily reminded by such a recognition of the kinship of the divine in mankind, that there truly is a force in the souls of men which shall still attain divinity.

Perhaps the beauty of this great memorial, showing Lincoln as if he were still brooding over his beloved America, is magnificently complete as it is. It ill becomes me to suggest any change. But if one wished to carve out the similitude of the growth of a soul in marble, the other side of the monument might show Lincoln as a boy, laid on his stomach before the fireplace of his boyhood log hut, tracing with charcoal on wrapping paper, the designs which were to later make him famous in perpetuity. The apotheosis of a great soul. Again the growth of the lotus.

It is a difficult thing to attempt to project the possible action of the great minds of the past into the present. It is not even easy for us to do it for our own futures. But a great speaker has said that we can only judge of the future by the past. Using that for a criterion, what might Lincoln have thought of some of the modern trends in America?

What do you think he would have thought about our membership in, and our acceptance of the domination of, the United Nations? No matter which way our sympathies lie in the noble, even if abortive, attempts of that body to attain international unity, what might he have thought of an America divided against itself, of a partial surrender of the indissolubility of the Union he loved, and for which he was willing to commit this country to an internecine war to preserve.

Knowing his passionate love of freedom and the rights of the minority, what do you think he would have thought of our partnership in the rape of Eastern Europe, of the enslavement of Poland and the Baltic countries, the double-crossing of China, as she tremblingly looked to us for support, even as did we to France and Lafayette? Would that eloquent voice have remained still to the wrongs in which we have acquiesced?

If Lincoln dared to throw all the forces of the United States against a dissolution of the Union, solidly resting upon the thesis that a state divided against itself must fall, what do you think he would have said and done against the thought of permitting a supergovernment, whose vote would outbalance us 59 to 1, to direct the destinies of the Union he loved, even in the regulation of our internal affairs, insofar as they might affect the well-being of the peoples of the superstate. In other words, if the UN should vote that we in America should be taxed a hundred million dollars to feed the hungry in India, they would have the power to do it. It is true they have not yet thought it wise to use that power, but the authority so to use it is still implicit in the Charter.

Might he not have rather acquiesced in the division of the Union here at home? Might he not rather have seen the flag of the Confederacy flying over the South than the flag of the UN flying over the divided allegiance at Lake Success? For, after all, the Confederate flag was an American flag. These people were Americans, only separated from us by the question of slavery, and that troubled situation would have righted itself within 20 years with the advent of modern machinery.

None can deny that we are in partnership at Lake Success with nations who have no interest in us except to mulct us of billions, or to propagandize us with their hated and alien doctrine. They are energized traps for the ignorant and unwary of America. Would the powers that be ever have dared to place Lincoln there as one of our representatives? And if they had, what do you think he would have said and done there? How would he have answered Vishinsky or Malik? What would he have done about Korea? What would he do now about it? Would he acquiesce in the daily doings at Lake Success? Would he?

That eloquent and wise soul, still brooding over his beloved America, might be heard throughout this land of his, still thunderously declaiming that a nation divided against itself cannot stand, and a thousand times more so when we form unions with such malignant and bloodstained mongrels as Russia and its satellites. However, we are now told that we must not use the word "satellite" in relation to Yugoslavia. The antirealists, presently presiding over the destinies of America, have decided that due to our Yugoslavian loan, they are now our friends, and the enemies of Soviet Russia. Tito, the bloodthirsty murderer, whose hands are red with the blood of our innocent aviators, whom he ruthlessly shot down because they accidentally flew over a small corner of his territory, has never disclaimed one jot or tittle of his complete and present firm adherence to the Communist Party line, and he has repeatedly warned that in any international conflict he would side with his enemy Stalin; but we are told that gold may buy true friendship, that words do not mean anything, and that wishful thinking may take the place of stark reality, and that we may build a nation's security and future on the foundation of such weasel words. What a naive people we are.

Our enemies have one saving grace. So far they have always told us exactly and truthfully what they planned to do. Hitler told us that he would occupy the Ruhr. Mussolini made no secret of his plans to devastate Ethiopia. Japan told us she would regulate the internal affairs of China against banditry. We did not believe them. We felt that human beings could not be base enough to do such things. Perhaps Americans would not, but our copartners in the United Nations have taught us a good deal about crimes against mankind and modern duplicity. When Alger Hiss wrote the text of the United Nations, we accepted it. We thought that good could come out of evil; that we might accomplish some great world good by thus compounding with evil. Ladies and gentlemen, we cannot; and we did not.

Can you visualize where Lincoln would have stood against all this modern sham, sophistry, and claptrap? That great American would have uncoiled his ungainly length, and his great voice would have eloquently thundered against the soul-destroying, un-American sophistry of the United Nations.

We Americans need to stop dead in our tracks. We need to scan the broad panorama of trends in this great land of ours, and try to constructively plan for the future of America. Never in the history of men have the stakes been so great. Never has freedom's candle burned so low. The world is waiting for a great message of freedom. America must give it. That is the only divinely appointed destiny we have.

No man having lighted a candle puts it under a bushel, or dilutes its light by exposing it in the midst of a circle of faint and dimly shaded beams; he rather places it on a hill where its rays may cut the darkness asunder with its gleams of brightness.

Similarly, we have lost our identity in the welter of ignorance and hypocrisy which is dominant in the deliberations of the United Nations. We are no more the white knight among the nations, and we have lost the imposing position we formerly enjoyed, whereby the oppressed and suffering of the world stretched out their yearning arms to America, the heaven of opportunity for them. Step by step, to the extent that we identify ourselves with this organization, we stultify and degrade our previous glorious history and heritage.

America existed in the mind of Lincoln as the most sublime thing his brilliant mind was able to envision: "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people." If he were present with us today, do you think he would countenance the sublime entity he loved being exchanged for a hodgepodge of chicanery and strife, wherein we are outvoted 59 to 1? Perish the thought.

Do we have the renewed vision of being true to the ideal of a strong and free America, released from the alien chains of internationalism? Are we great enough to once again stand for the kind of America Washington and Lincoln wished us to be? Strike off the chains of internationalism, and arise once again like a giant refreshed by sleep to point the way to true brotherhood because we have attained it within our own national economy. Dilution decreases strength. Mixing with incompatibles tends to explosions. Ruskin taught in his essay on the formation of a diamond the importance of unity. Mankind is still waiting for the vision of a free America, leading the world, as a bright and shining light, unmixed with the alien and nation-destroying idea of a world government.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 816, Eightieth Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. ROONEY, New York; Mr. LUCAS, Texas; Mr. SCRIVNER, Kansas; Mrs. ST. GEORGE, New York.

DRAFTING OF FARM YOUTHS FOR MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a telegram which I received.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to read at this time a wire which I have received describing very vividly the farm-labor problem in Minnesota. This telegram is as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., February 10, 1951.

The Honorable H. CARL ANDERSEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Minnesota farmers are facing a serious manpower squeeze because of the present policies in drafting of farm youths for military service. Victor Christgau, State employment director, reports farm-labor shortage is serious. Only half as many farm workers were available in January 1951 as in January 1950, he says in statement issued Friday, February 9. Minnesota farmers highly resent present policy of nonselective drafting of farm youths, on ground that such policy deprives farmers of essential labor, thus creating unnecessary hardship and unequal sacrifice and resulting in loss of farms and interference with vital food production. Farm boys raised on farms provide skilled help that is not replaceable under present conditions. Unless action is taken immediately spring planting may be vastly hampered and vital food production cut. The Minnesota Farmers Union urges that immediate action be taken for issuance of instructions to all Minnesota draft boards to defer all farm youths on proof they are essential to maximum operation of family farm.

EDWIN CHRISTIANSON,
President, Minnesota Farmers Union.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRICES

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, I introduced H. R. 2333, which, if enacted, would amend the Defense Production Act of 1950 so as to authorize the President to control food prices under that act to the same extent as other commodities. The measure was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and as of today no date has been set for a hearing on the bill, although I have asked that this be done. It seems to me the matter is growing in urgency.

During the months before the price freeze, prices were rapidly increasing and the administration obliged the opportunists by giving them plenty of time to get their prices up before freezing prices at the highest level. This fact, added to the food-price loophole, is making price controls a still-born product of political cowardice and economic special privilege. The exemption of food prices from control is a standing invitation for further food price increases, and the level to which they may be increased without becoming subject to control is rising as other prices affecting the parity formula continue to go up.

The American people are willing to make any required sacrifices provided all make equal sacrifices. They are not willing to see the political power of the farm groups used to place food in such a category that farmers will be the one group which can never suffer from price control. Since the start of the war in Korea, the great majority of consumers have had no increase in income, but skyrocketing prices have, in effect, reduced their incomes, and now we are proposing to reduce them still further by heavier taxes. To state the same thing differently, wages, social security, and fixed incomes have been sharply reduced by higher prices and higher taxes. We owe it to wage earners and the other hard-pressed consumer groups of this Nation to take politics out of price control and to make every group subject to the Defense Production Act of 1950. If our Office of Price Stabilization is capable of controlling prices for other groups on an equitable basis, it is capable of doing the same thing with food prices. From the performance of the price control office thus far, it would appear that it is of no value to consumers but of great value to the usual irresponsible profiteers who know how to use an emergency to make a quick dollar.

May I call your attention to two editorials taken from outstanding newspapers on both coasts and both requesting control of food prices. These editorials were printed in the Los Angeles Times and in the New York Times. For the benefit of Members who may not have seen them, I am asking that they be included in our RECORD at this point:

[From the New York Times of February 11, 1951]

INFLATION BY PROCRASTINATION

One of the most encouraging items of news to date from the price-control front has come from the office of Charles E. Wilson, Defense Mobilization Chief. A spokesman for Mr. Wilson is quoted as saying that the head of the ODM is deeply concerned over the rising trend of food prices, particularly bread grains and other farm products that have not yet reached parity.

The Defense Production Act, as most persons are probably now aware, exempts from price ceilings all farm commodities selling at less than 100 percent of parity, and the administration has chosen to blink at this farm-price gap in the price ceiling. The public should understand that in continuing to ignore this glaring weakness in the law the administration is deliberately playing into the hands of further price inflation. For, with rare exceptions, prices that are uncellinged today can move only in an upward direction, and this tendency is accelerated when the Government, in effect, virtually guarantees an artificial floor under them.

It was procrastination of just this kind that left farm prices uncellinged in the Second World War for about 8 months after all other categories of prices had been frozen. The Emergency Price Control Act became law on January 30, 1942, but it was not until the following October that the farm bloc capitulated to public opinion by revoking the provision calling for 110 percent of parity or better for farm prices. That capitulation, however, was a grim joke on the Nation's consumers. For by its tactics the farm bloc had succeeded in staving off the inevitable public reaction long enough to achieve its original objective. Indeed, farm prices had gained such momentum by that time that whereas they started the year 1942 at 101 percent of parity the final month of that year found them at 114 percent. If that experience should teach us anything it is that the time to clamp down on farm prices is not 6 months from now, or a month from now, but now.

[From the Los Angeles Times of February 8, 1951]

THE LAW REQUIRES HIGH FOOD PRICES

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that retail food prices reached an all-time high in the first 2 weeks of January. Every housewife is aware that prices haven't gone down since then. The Bureau turned the knife in the wound in pointing out that the price of groceries now is 220.5 percent above the 1935–39 average.

CORRECTING TRUMAN

The administration's price doctors have given the injured consumers the impression that they can do something about this. They can roll back prices, they say, simply by commanding wholesalers and retailers to cut. President Truman has helped them to make this roll-back look not only easy but fair by stating that the middlemen and retailers were gouging the public. He said the farmers had not profited from the rise in prices since the outbreak of the Korean War.

But Mr. Truman was misinformed. The fact is that farmers have gotten 80 percent of the food price increases which have occurred since last June. The figure comes from a Bureau of Mr. Truman's own branch of the Government—the Commodity Exchange Authority of the Department of Agriculture.

As long as the farmers get higher and higher prices for their products—and by law—it is foolish to talk of price reduction at the counter. A rollback of the sort the housewives dream of would drive the grocers out of business.

GALLOPING PARITY

If there is to be any substantial reduction in food prices Congress will have to change the Defense Production Act. This law, which is full of headaches for the layman, provides that no ceilings may be put on farm products which are selling below parity prices or below the highest prices received between May 24 and June 24, 1950—whichever is higher.

Parity prices are continuously revised—and nowadays always upward. The law states that they must be determined by the prices farmers pay for things they need. If the price of automobiles goes up, for example, that increase will be a factor in determining the higher level of parity prices.

The Department of Agriculture reported to the public on January 31 that some food prices can rise as much as 200 percent above present levels due to the operation of the parity arrangement; that is, before they are "fair" in comparison with the prices farmers must pay.

This parity arrangement at first glance may seem to be just. But it really is not because it gives the farmers an advantage in these rugged times over almost every other class of citizens. The price of the automobile might rise so much that the average wage or salary earner would decide he could not afford a new one unless his pay was raised. But he is told that the wage freeze forbids his employer to pay him more. The farmer, on the other hand, gets his permissible crop price raised by law so that he may be better able to buy the automobile at the higher price.

This same law, which requires higher and higher ceilings, at the farm, also requires that ceiling prices on processed foods must be high enough to reflect the farm price level.

A TENDER SUBJECT

It doesn't take much figuring to prove that food prices will not go down until this law is changed. Any attempt to hold wages in line will fail in the end if food prices—the most important item in the family budget—continue to rise or even stand for very long where they are right now.

Of course, farm legislation is a very tender political subject. Mr. Truman would be heroic if he faced it. His misstatement of the other day, blaming the middlemen and the grocers, does not give much hope that reform will be initiated by him.

But there is some hope to be had in the attitude of the farmers themselves. Every now and then their spokesmen say that the farmers cannot float through this emergency in their special heaven. Just the other day Wilson A. Heaps, head of the Maryland Farm Bureau Federation, told his constituents that "the well considered opinion of good farmers from Maryland and every other State" is that "we have reached the time when all Government payments to farmers should be suspended." The consciences of these good farmers undoubtedly are troubled by the built-in jacks of the farm price ceilings.

GREATER EFFICIENCY IN THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the people of this great country are looking to this Congress and to the Federal Government for the leadership to which they are rightfully entitled, and among those people are numbered the men in Korea who have so gallantly stemmed the tide of communistic aggression. The American people have been told and we all know that we are headed into a period of sacrifices and hardships in order to meet the tests of free men. This period of sacrifice and hardship is not going to be shortened by selfishness and greed on the part of individuals, but it can be shortened by unity of purpose and sincere industry by all. Lip service alone will not suffice; therefore it is my position now that the members of the executive and legislative branches of this Government should submit for taxation their annual expense account allowances; that all departments of the Government should be open and doing business 6 days a week without further costs to the taxpayers, and that Federal employees should lead the way toward more production and greater efficiency without additional cost.

ENLISTMENT OF FOREIGN NATIONALS IN THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, a committee of another body recently reported legislation which recognizes the desirability of including in the Armed Forces of the United States the nationals of other nations. Unfortunately, that committee, in my opinion, did not go nearly far enough. They provide only for 25,000 enlistments per year for a period of 5 years, which is a mere drop in the bucket; but it is a step in the right direction.

That committee also proposes to make American citizens out of those who may thus enlist. In my opinion it is neither necessary nor desirable to bribe the people of foreign nations with a promise of American citizenship to get them to enlist in the United States Army in order to defend their own homes.

To me it seems ridiculous that our committees should take such a self-righteous attitude about what they call mercenary troops. To unctuously state that "America can never let paid hirelings assume the burden of defense," and then turn around and offer something more valuable than gold—our Nation's most priceless gift—American citizenship as payment to a small handful of foreigners.

I submit, if we can pay foreign soldiers with citizenship, we can surely pay them with money. If we can accept the principle of foreign enlistments in an army to the extent of 25,000 per year, we can surely accept enough such enlistments to promptly build up a really effective force before it is too late.

One of the most important features of the proposal that I have made to this Congress in regard to the enlistment of foreign nationals, is that we should give the people of Germany a chance to defend their own homes, that we should give the people of Japan a chance to defend their homes; not that we should make these people Americans and bring them to the United States to defend this country on our side of the oceans.

I want these people to join in defending the free world—and that defense must start by defending their own homes.

I am primarily interested in reducing the number of American boys that we must send to these distant lands. I know that if we will offer these people a job on definite, specific terms which they can accept or reject, many of them will accept. I propose to let them make the choice. If they do not want to eat American Army food and wear American Army clothes, I do not propose to force any of them into service. What is wrong with making the offer, and why do we have to offer American citizenship before we even give these people a chance to serve on a straight dollars-and-cents basis?

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to address the House on tomorrow for 1 hour, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

ADDITIONAL RESTAURANT FACILITIES

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced House Resolution 109, which would create an additional restaurant on Capitol Hill. It is needless to say that these restaurant facilities are badly needed to serve Members, their staffs, the press, committees and their employees, liaison office personnel, and visitors who come here from throughout America. Under the provisions of this resolution the restaurant would be located in the Old House Office Building. There are at the present time 193 Members who have offices in the Old House Office Building. At the time I came to Congress I only had two employees on my staff; today I have four. If you multiply 4 by 193 Members in the Old House Office Building—or 5, because a Member ought to be included—there are several hundred people who have to be fed. Precious time is lost by having to stand in line at the new House Office Building cafeteria. It makes for inefficiency until we do have another restaurant or cafeteria to serve the large personnel who work in the various offices on the House side of the Capitol. I commend to the membership of this House and the members of the Committee on House Administration this very fine piece of legislation. Early action should be taken on this resolution.

NOW IS THE TIME FOR GENERAL MACARTHUR TO REPORT IN PERSON TO CONGRESS AND THE AMERICAN PEOPLE ON THE ASIATIC SITUATION

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on February 2 the American people and Congress received a report of the findings of Gen. Dwight Eisenhower on his recent tour of Europe.

Since that date his report, as well as the policy of our Government toward Europe, have been the topic of much discussion by many prominent Americans with little being said about our problem in Asia.

Mr. Speaker, the American people and the Congress of the United States are entitled to an authoritative report on conditions in Asia and for that reason I renew the request I made on February 2, that President Truman order Gen. Douglas MacArthur to return immediately and give us his report on Asia.

As I said on February 2, in the opinion of millions of people General MacArthur knows Asia as General Eisenhower knows Europe and his views are vital at this moment so that Congress and the American people may have a complete picture of what we are faced with in Asia and Europe.

Now is the time to have General MacArthur report in person to Congress and the American people.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include an address delivered last Friday night by former President of the United States, Mr. Herbert Hoover.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SECRETARY ACHESON

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is often very easy to agree with what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] tells us. Especially is it true when he talks about the security of our Republic, the welfare of our people. Had the Congress heeded his warning, followed his advice, we would have avoided World War II, not now be in world war III. Nor would the Communists ever have gained power in the executive departments.

It would be very, very helpful to those in command in Korea, it would be very encouraging to those who are on the battlefront, if "General" Acheson, who seems to be directing our military operations—whether he is doing it at the request or under the direction of the United Nations no one seems to know—but it would be very encouraging to those I have mentioned if while "Acting Secretary of State" Eisenhower is fronting for him on the diplomatic front, he, "General" Acheson, would make up his mind whether he owes allegiance to the British Empire or to the United States of America.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, the current debate on foreign policy has been labeled "the great debate." Leading Senators are participating. A former President of the United States, past and present Presidential aspirants, columnists, editors, commentators, all have spoken. Yet the debate itself, up to this point, is scarcely deserving of the label "great." The subject matter, Foreign Policy, is of great importance. But a debate to be great must be so both in subject matter and in argument. It is on the basis of argument that the current debate fails to achieve greatness.

Time does not permit me to distinguish the fine shades of difference among the various participants in this debate. It is my intention, today, to inquire into the validity of the general propositions.

Actually the isolationists have raised no new arguments, neither have they fortified their old ones. It is simply that circumstances have temporarily silenced other voices and have amplified the force of the scattered small voices of isolationism. Why is it that the isolationist position, which received scarcely any hearing a short time ago, is acclaimed today? Principally because at a time when foreign policy cannot be simply drawn, they proclaim that they have a simple answer. Because at a time when we are suffering military losses, they offer an immediate, although temporary, relief. Because at a time when we are beginning to see fully the mistake of our overly enthusiastic offers to Russia in order to secure her support in the war against Japan, and when we are forced to admit the error of hasty demobilization and withdrawal from Europe, they propose to ignore the consequences of these mistakes. Because when we as a Nation are experiencing the full psychological shock of the reality and enormity of the problem facing us, they tempt us to retreat from the reality, and invite us back to the childhood of our national life, when our responsibility was limited to our country alone.

Of course, if we do not challenge the premises of the isolationists, they can build a logical case. If, for example, we accept that the United States as a nation is in decline and that we are about to go down in defeat, as some of them apparently assume; if we are merely postponing that day, their proposal that we make our final stand, together, at home, offers a certain natural consolation. The weakness of the argument lies in the fact that the premise is unacceptable.

If we assume, as does Mr. Kennedy, the former Ambassador to England, that "the more people that are under its"—communism's—"yoke, the greater are the possibilities of revolt," it follows simply that in order to bring about the downfall of communism we should encourage the Russian absorption of all Europe and Asia. The Kennedy argument might stand if Russia were forced to swallow and attempt to digest all the peoples of Europe and Asia immediately. However, if we permit her to consume them according to her own schedule, the consequences projected by Mr. Kennedy are not likely to follow.

A third assumption upon which the isolationist case is built by some is this, namely, that the Communists will reach the point of satisfaction short of attack upon the United States. This position approximates that of Senator TAFT, who has said this of the Russians:

> Their purpose of military aggression may well wither and gradually peaceful relations in Europe may grow again. The desire of human beings for peace, comfort, and normal human relations is a powerful force which will constantly reassert itself.

This, it seems to me, is the most dangerous of all the false assumptions of the isolationists. It returns us to the old error of failure to recognize the basic evil of communism, of failure to realize that evil too can be a progressive force, and that its growth is limited only by the fertility of imagination, the viciousness of will, and the power of those who control the totalitarian state.

There is another ill-defined isolationist position based on a kind of lofty neutralism or detachment. This, I believe, is closest to the position taken by Mr. Hoover and the Gibraltar school. For the United States this school proposes "no peace, no war, unless you bring it to us." For Europe our policy is to be one of encouraging them "to arm and defend themselves." Our Asiatic policy, as Mr. Hoover defines it, is to "exert great pressure for rectitude."

In the face of this general assault by the isolationists it is important for us to return to a consideration of the objectives of American foreign policy. Only in the light of such consideration can we properly determine what our program of action should be.

American foreign policy in the twentieth century has pursued four main objectives:

First. It has sought to preserve western civilization, that of the United States and of Western Europe.

Second. It has sought to preserve the national honor of the United States.

Third. It has been directed to insure the territorial integrity of the United States and to secure and defend our life lines to vital materials.

Fourth. It has undertaken to raise the economic and cultural levels of peoples of other civilizations. And thus to promote the cause of justice and world peace.

Let us look at the record. We entered the European wars against Germany, first to save the peoples of Western Europe from militaristic domination, and then to preserve them from Nazi oppression. We took up the Japanese challenge in order to defend our national honor and to prevent the Japanese from cutting us off from vital supplies of tin, rubber, and other materials. We were concerned too with preventing Japanese oppression of the peoples of Asia and Oceania.

Since World War II we have continued to participate in world affairs by diplomatic action and by various aid programs, military and economic, seeking to establish more perfectly and more securely an order of justice and peace among the peoples of the earth.

The important questions of foreign policy facing us today are fundamentally the same as they were at the time of our entrance into World War I and again at the time of our entrance into World War II and in the postwar period.

If we are to have a foreign policy worthy of the United States, worthy of our great tradition; if we are not to repudiate our actions and sacrifices in two world wars and our great effort toward peace since the end of the last war, we must continue a positive and affirmative policy and program.

We must undertake to preserve western civilization and the peoples who value it. This responsibility is like that of a child to its parents. Our ties of blood and of belief bind us to Western Europe. In moments of extreme nationalism we are prone to forget or reject our inheritance. We cannot, however, escape the reality. Edmund Burke has stated it in this manner:

> Men are not tied to one another by paper and seals. They are led to associate by resemblances, by conformities, by sympathies. It is with nations as with individuals. Nothing is so strong a tie or amity between nation and nation as correspondence in laws, customs, manners, and habits of life. They are obligations written in the heart.

We must guard and protect our lifelines to vital materials to necessary supplies of oil, tin, manganese, uranium. We must keep these areas of supply open. Such protective action is the condition of survival.

We must preserve our national honor. This is simply to say that we must accept, as we have in the past, the responsibility that goes with national maturity and power. The more actual power and strength a nation possesses the greater is its moral responsibility for action against injustice. This moral responsibility grows in international affairs often without corresponding increase in legal authority or responsibility. The absence of legal machinery, however, does not void our responsibility.

Finally the United States must act, insofar as able, to raise the economic and cultural level of peoples of other civilizations and thus to promote the cause of justice and world peace. As a Christian people we cannot be indifferent to the poverty of other peoples, whether that poverty be material, intellectual, or spiritual. America must not turn its back upon the world.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances; in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article entitled "Jet Fighters Put Umbrella Over Midwest France."

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and to include an editorial in each.

Mr. ELLIOTT (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and to include in each extraneous matter.

Mr. YORTY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. BARING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article by a constituent.

Mr. LESINSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address he made on Sunday last.

Mr. BURDICK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. McMULLEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] given before the District of Columbia League of Republican Women.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BUTLER, for the required time, on account of a death in the family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 14, 1951, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

195. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a proposed increase of $3,850,000 in the limitation on the amount available for the administrative expenses for the fiscal year 1951 for the Commodity Credit Corporation, Department of Agriculture (H. Doc. No. 57); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

196. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting copies of the orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service granting the application for permanent residence filed by the subjects of such orders; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

197. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting the annual report of the Civil Aeronautics Board, covering the fiscal year 1950; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana:

H. R. 2608. A bill to amend the Federal Credit Union Act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CELLER:

H. R. 2609. A bill to amend section 22 (b) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. JONES of Alabama:

H. R. 2610. A bill to regulate the operation and conduct of commercial parking of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. KLEIN:

H. R. 2611. A bill to authorize the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight-saving time in the District; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. R. 2612. A bill to authorize the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight-saving time in the District; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee:

H. R. 2613. A bill to amend section 604 (b) of the Classification Act of 1949 (63 Stat. 966) so that certain Federal employees whose positions are subject to the Classification Act of 1949 may not be reduced in compensation; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. REED of New York:

48. Also, petition of John J. A. Ager, executive director, Twenty-ninth Division Association, Inc., Washington, D. C., endorsing the stand of Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR in opposing shipment of material of value to Communist China, and recommending complete embargo against Communist China; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and eternal God, may this Lenten season upon which we have entered daily become richer and more glorious in the culture and deepening of our spiritual life.

Cleanse our souls of all unrighteousness as we give ourselves to meditation and quiet waiting upon Thee in the spirit of contrition and confession, of penitence and humility.

Grant that by self-examination and self-discipline our wills may be strengthened to gain the mastery over every insurgent impulse, every inordinate desire, and every self-indulgent habit of life.

May each day of this blessed season be a veritable gateway through which we shall enter joyously into the spiritual realities of the more abundant life and receive the benediction of Thy grace and peace.

Hear us in the name of our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SIMPSON] may be granted a week's leave of absence on account of the death of his brother.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

RUSSIA'S DISPOSITION OF AMERICAN LEASE-LEND SHIPS

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a copy of a letter dated February 7, 1951, written by Shigeru Yoshida, Prime Minister of Japan, addressed to John Foster Dulles, and dealing with the subject of fisheries in the eastern Pacific and in the Bering Sea. The Prime Minister informs Mr. Dulles that the Japanese Government will, pending the negotiations for a peace treaty with the United States, voluntarily prohibit their national residents and vessels from carrying on fishing operations in presently conserved fisheries in the above waters. Particularly involved are the salmon and halibut fisheries. The Japanese Government recognizes that this country, and possibly others, has adopted certain voluntary self-denying measures to prevent the exhaustion of high seas fisheries. It also recognizes in the letter that if these conserved fisheries were to be subjected to uncontrolled fishing from other countries the result would be international friction and the exhaustion of the fisheries themselves.

Japan is to be commended for its action in this matter. Much credit must also be given to Mr. Dulles who undoubtedly discussed the subject with representatives of the Japanese Government in his recent visit. However, most credit for obtaining this action by the Japanese Prime Minister must be given to Mr. Miller Freeman, of the Pacific Fisheries Conference, and Mr. Edward Allen, attorney, both of Seattle, Wash. Both Mr. Freeman and Mr. Allen have long been interested in Pacific fisheries matters. One of their primary objectives has been the protection and preservation of our own salmon and halibut fisheries. They have constantly urged that the proposed Japanese peace treaty contain provisions dealing with this subject. During the past year conferences were held with Japanese representatives in which the matter was discussed. The views of the Pacific Fisheries Conference were made known to Mr. Dulles prior to his trip to Japan. Mr. Dulles was urged to support the views of the conference and was requested to take with him a United States fisheries consultant. Both Mr. Freeman and Mr. Allen were aware, not only of the need for conserving fishery resources, but also of the possibility of international friction if the problem was not properly handled. Their extended efforts to settle the question are largely responsible for the voluntary action on the part of the Japanese Government. It is to be hoped that the peace treaty when finally drawn will permanently settle the matter.

Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I should like to discuss another matter with the membership of the House.

A recent news release has stated that Russia has handed Communist China several former Japanese warships as the nucleus of a South China fleet and has assigned 50 Soviet officers to train the Chinese.

Another recent news account informs us that our State Department has requested and is now negotiating for the return of 672 naval and merchant vessels which we loaned to Russia under lend-lease during World War II. These include 87 merchant vessels built by us during the war at a cost of some one million to one and a half million dollars each. No one seems to know how many millions of dollars the naval vessels cost us. So far as I have been able to ascertain, this is the second request made by us since the end of the war for the return of these vessels. The news account says that Russia has refused to discuss the return of the ships.

In view of Russia's attitude, and in view also of the fact that the House Committee on Maritime Affairs has been unable to find out where the vessels are or to what use they are put, the question is raised whether or not some of these vessels have not also, like the Japanese warships, been turned over to Communist China. I, for one, would like to know, and I intend to ask the State Department to make full inquiry into the matter.

The whole affair seems ridiculous, as does the action of our own Government in the matter. We have been informed that we were going to stop our policy of appeasement and speak to Russia in firmer tones. From what has happened and is happening it would seem that our determination to change our policy has not proceeded beyond the talking stage. Through our appeasement policy we have helped Russia and her satellites to build up their war machine. We are still continuing to do so. As an illustration, may I point to our continued trade with Russia at our expense. She has exported products to our country in order to obtain our dollars with which to purchase strategic materials. For instance, during the past 5 years we had imported almost $200,000,000 worth of Russian furs at the expense of our own domestic fur industry. Several thousand American fur farmers have been driven out of business because they cannot compete with Russian slave or forced labor. Our Department of State and Department of Commerce say they cannot do anything about this matter because furs are on the so-called free list. This despite the fact that by law the Secretary of Commerce can prohibit the importation of products manufactured by slave or forced labor. As a matter of fact, the Secretary of Commerce recently prohibited the importation of crabmeat from Russia under his legal authority to do so. Why can he not also prohibit the importation of Russian furs? Why cannot our officials face the facts? Why do they have to continue this pretense and sham?

EXTRA COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN WORK PERFORMED BY CUSTOMS OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1009) to provide for the payment of extra compensation for certain work heretofore performed by customs officers and employees, and for other purposes, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1898) authorizing an annual appropriation to enable the Secretary of Commerce to compile and make available information and statistical data relating to travel within the United States and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

IN SUPPORT OF THE WHITTEN AMENDMENT

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in approving the Whitten amendment to the Supplemental Appropriation Act for fiscal year 1951, the Congress exercised sound judgment. It is my view that the operation of the Whitten amendment has saved millions of dollars and will save more in the future. This amendment should be strengthened, not weakened, and should be included in the appropriation bill for fiscal year 1952.

I am certain that all Members of Congress desire to prevent personnel abuses and malpractices which occurred in the Federal civil service during World War II. The present national emergency must not be used as an excuse to build up a gigantic permanent Federal payroll. Veterans who return from the Armed Forces at the conclusion of the national emergency must be given an opportunity to compete for Federal positions and those veterans returning to Federal jobs should be given consideration for higher positions. Unwarranted upgrading of positions and excessive pyramiding of jobs at the higher levels must be prevented.

I do not believe anyone in the Government disputes the fact that most new appointments in the Federal service during the present emergency should be made on a temporary or indefinite basis. The Whitten amendment merely provides that the Civil Service Commission should exercise its power and authority to carry out this policy.

In addition, the Whitten amendment provides that transfers and promotions within the Federal service should be made on a temporary basis. After examining the views of the Civil Service Commission, I find it is in substantial accord with this policy. It is the desire of Congress to protect the rights of veterans who return to the Federal service at the conclusion of the emergency.

In strengthening the Whitten amendment, it is my belief that a provision should be included to prevent the too rapid promotion rate among certain Federal employees which occurred during World War II so that at the conclusion of the emergency there will not be an excessive and disproportionate number of persons occupying positions in the higher grades.

Specifically, the changes which I advocate to strengthen the Whitten amendment are: First, provide that employees may not be promoted to a higher grade without a waiting period of at least 12 months; second, require that the Civil Service Commission should provide reemployment rights for all permanent status employees who transfer to defense departments and agencies from nondefense Government activities; and third, allow promotions on a permanent basis only for permanent status employees who are promoted to positions which were in existence prior to September 2, 1950—the effective date of the Whitten amendment—contingent upon a reexamination of such promotions upon the return of veterans to the Federal service who were not considered for such higher positions during their service in the Armed Forces.

Under this policy and the Whitten amendment, the number of permanent status employees of the Government will not be increased. However, at the same time there would be maintained a civil-service system which recognizes the merit, ability, experience, and length of service of status civil-service employees. In addition, the national defense activities will have been aided with the full utilization of thousands of experienced Federal employees now engaged in nondefense work.

LOYALTY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is their objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I was indeed delighted to pick up the Washington Post this morning and see on the front page a headline to the effect, "Reasonable doubt of loyalty should bring dismissal of United States worker, Review Board says."

Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week, day before yesterday, February 12, in a speech before this body I pointed out the weakness in President Truman's loyalty program, under which the Loyalty Review Board has had to work for the past few years.

The new Chairman of the Loyalty Review Board, former United States Senator from Connecticut, and the majority of the members of the Board are to be congratulated on passing a resolution in accordance with my suggestions that the President change the standards under which the Board has to work at present.

It is regrettable that Mr. Seth Richardson, who was Chairman of the Loyalty Review Board for nearly 4 years, did not take similar action all during the time he was Chairman. The fact that Mr. Richardson did not take such action is one of many reasons why he is not qualified to be Chairman of the Board to administer the McCarran Act.

If Mr. Truman is sincere in wanting to really rid the Government of all employees who are disloyal, he will immediately adopt the recommendations of his Loyalty Review Board. It is his responsibility, and it is up to him to either back up the Board or publicly admit he does not intend to have a real loyalty program.

Quoting from the Washington Post, Senator Bingham said:

> Where there are reasonable doubts of his loyalty no person should be employed by the Federal Government.

I agree with that statement, and I think Senator Bingham and the Loyalty Review Board are to be congratulated on their stand.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of next week, at the conclusion of the legislative program and other special orders, I may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Thursday of next week is Washington's Birthday. Are we going to have them read Washington's Farewell Address again?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is already arranged for.

Mr. RANKIN. Who is going to read it?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman will have to ask the Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. I see.

Mr. McCORMACK. You see, we alternate each year.

Mr. RANKIN. He ought to be blindfolded or have his eyes shaded so that he cannot see these communistic caricatures on the walls of the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. All able and scholarly men.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ENLISTMENT OF FOREIGN NATIONALS IN THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, the Department of National Defense presented a report on the bill which I have introduced to authorize the enlistment of nationals of other countries in the Army of the United States. The Department said that they preferred to reserve final decision on the matter pending further investigation and asked that no action on the bill be taken at this time. I am glad the Department is ready to make further investigation. I am disappointed that the Department has not already investigated this matter over the number of years that have passed and it has not already recognized the importance of using German and Japanese nationals to do some of the fighting to protect this world from communism. I hope that when they have completed their investigation that they may come in with a recommendation that will encourage some of the other people of the world to do some of the fighting along with the American boys.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter, especially a resolution I am introducing today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 90 minutes.

DECLARATION OF FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to submit for the RECORD a statement on foreign policy signed at this moment by 118 Republican Members of this body. It should be clear that we do not speak for the Republican leadership. Nor has the statement been submitted to the Republican policy committee although some members of the committee have signed it. This matter, therefore, should not be considered as being sponsored by the Republican leadership. We fully realize that a division exists in our party on this issue. It is entirely possible that those who have signed are not in complete agreement. Some wanted to make it stronger; some thought that it should contain a definite reference to the war in Korea; some are opposed to sending large contingents of troops to Western Europe; others agree that this is necessary. Those who have signed it are at liberty to elaborate on the particular point that interests them most.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week I introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives calling on the President to consult the Congress before sending additional United States troops overseas. Certainly the American people are entitled to have their chosen legislative representatives consulted before American boys are sent across the water to fight on foreign soil. A matter of such gravity and importance should not be determined in the Pentagon nor in the executive offices alone, but should be decided in the open debate of the Congress by the representatives of the people of the United States.

Far from being an impediment to any military effort that is necessary, such consultation will strengthen the hand of the United States internationally and domestically as well. If the Congress decides this matter, or is consulted about it, as provided by my resolution, then we will have closed our ranks and foreclosed any division, both for ourselves and before all the world. In a representative government such as ours, it is the legislators chosen by the electorate who are directly answerable to the American people.

The debate that is now going on in the Congress concerning this and related matters is not a new subject in American political history. It represents the latest of a long series of struggles between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. Perhaps such a conflict is implicit in our Constitution which makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, but reserves to the Congress the power to declare war.

Never before, however, so far as I know, has an administration undertaken to ignore the Congress and commit the manpower and vast resources of the country to foreign fields without the consent of or consultation with the legislative body. Indeed, few Presidents would wish to assume such an enormous responsibility, in view of the possible consequences of such an act.

If this is a government of checks and balances as most of us believe it to be, here is one of the places where the check should be placed upon the improvident exercise of power by the Executive.

I also was a signatory to the declaration of policy signed by well over 100 Members of the House of Representatives. That declaration of policy is directly in line with the resolution which I introduced. It suggests that the future military and political policy of this country must be determined with the full participation and approval of the Congress.

In this critical hour in American history, with the menace of communism threatening western civilization, the responsibility for safeguarding America rests, not only upon the Executive but on the elected representatives of the people, and ultimately, upon all American citizens. Only by free and full discussion and debate, can a righteous and workable conclusion be reached which will enlist support and unflinching defense for the survival of American constitutional government.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I, too, am a signatory to this statement which I think covers the situation, but the point I want to make is this: The question in the minds of the American people today is a question as to how successful our foreign policy has been during the last 5 years. That question can only be answered by a statement of fact. The fact is that during these 5 years we have spent $100,000,000,000 in this so-called cold war to contain communism or fence it in and keep it from spreading. During the same 5 years Stalin has reached out his long arms and claws and taken into his orbit, taken into his sphere of influence, 600,000,000 more people, until today he has over 900,000,000 people that he is dictator over. He has also surrounded himself during those 5 years with satellite nations all around, and today he sits in Moscow just like a big fat spider in the middle of his web, and he pulls a string in Korea and the flames of war break out. We have to send our fire brigade there to put out the flames. When and if we get them out, he can and he will pull a string in Indochina or in Siam or in Turkey or Greece or in Berlin or Yugoslavia, and after 3 or 4 years of that where will we be? We will be bled white; and, without losing a man of his own, he will then be ready to take over. I ask you, has our foreign policy during the past 5 years been successful in view of that, and if it has not been successful, is it not time we changed the men who have been drawing up this blueprint of our foreign policy?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman want me to answer that?

Mr. MASON. I would like to have that answered.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Well, it is a big order, of course, but it seems to me that we have always considered that our diplomacy has failed when we have to rely upon the military. That is exactly the position we are in today.

Now I would like to proceed for a few minutes, and then I will be glad to yield to anybody who wants to ask me questions.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question at this time?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I am not unmindful, and I do not believe the rest of the membership of this House is unmindful of the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is, by far, the greatest authority on the real American approach to our foreign policy. I know all will agree when I say that his reasoning is always sound and logical and that he always bears in mind at all times what is best for America.

The question I wish to ask the gentleman is this: Many say that the slaughtering of tens of thousands of our boys in Korea is stopping the spread of communism; how is this slaughtering of our American boys 7,000 miles away stopping the spread of communism?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I do not think it is, if the gentleman please.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. As a good American I thought the gentleman would answer that way.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. Speaker, perilous days are ahead for the people of this country. Government propaganda is beating the war drums again as it did in 1917 and in 1939. People are alarmed and confused. They have lost confidence in the President and, yes, in Congress, too, and they are demanding that something be done to save them from total disaster. This is so because our foreign policy has been a complete failure, notwithstanding great victories on the battlefield. It has been well said that the fist of military mobilization is pounding hard at the door of millions of homes today. By and large the civilians have surrendered almost entirely to the demands of the military. Hence the worried parent and the perplexed youth feel that they are just being herded along without much planning or direction. They know that an emergency has been declared, but many doubt its necessity.

The three or four million manpower is to be added to our Military Establishment, yet reports reach their ears which cause disturbing questions. Millions of youths are having their lives, their careers, and their homes disrupted and shattered. Oh, yes, it will be said that our country is in danger and they cannot expect to enjoy living an ordinary life as usual. This in spite of the fact that military training camps already have more men now than they can handle. They are usually overcrowded with shortages of facilities and equipment which makes adequate training almost impossible. It is a known fact that the Navy, Marine, and Air Corps has had, and still have, more men than they can use. It is true that enlistments are up, but that is so because the boys have a certain pride and want to choose their branch of service rather than submit to the draft. What excuse, then, is there for now insisting upon the drafting of 18-year-old boys? The American people are waiting for an answer to that question.

Mr. Speaker, every Member of this body knows that the public is demanding action on our foreign policy. Mail is heavy with demands for removal and impeachment of Secretary of State Acheson. Since 1945 this Nation has been in the hands of Truman, Acheson, and Marshall, and now they are conjuring up another war.

One writer has said that these three form a triumvirate of mutual admiration. Truman calls Marshall the greatest living American. Marshall says that Truman is, and they both agree that Acheson is the third greatest living American. This writer goes on to say that—

General Marshall is a good man and a patriot, but he is usually wrong. He can't remember where he was the night before Pearl Harbor. He sat at Roosevelt's side at Tehran when Stalin swiped half of Europe. He insisted upon giving Russia control of Manchuria in order to induce Russia to fight Japan. He wanted Chiang Kai-shek to coalesce with the Chinese Communists. He advised Truman to send troops to Europe.

Is there any doubt about the concern of the people.

Let me give you one illustration and I am sure it could be duplicated many times over. In the city of Aberdeen, Wash., two newspapers were so concerned about our foreign policy that they took a people's poll on questions relating to foreign policy. The Aberdeen Daily World and the Grays Harbor Washingtonian submitted seven questions to the people. You will be surprised at the results and I give them to you at this time. The result is based on a total of 2,345 ballots and the newspapers report they are still coming in.

	Yes	No
1. Do you favor the administration's foreign policy?	157	2,073
2. Do you favor Hoover's Western Hemisphere Gibraltar proposals?	776	539
3. Should this country order all-out mobilization (Dewey's plan)?	654	445
4. Do you think our foreign policy should be restudied and revised?	1,803	167
5. Do you favor holding Formosa and aiding Kai-shek?	754	385
6. Do you favor rearming Japan?	696	319
7. Do you favor rearming Germany?	620	484

A prominent citizen from my own district writes me as follows and I consider him a great American. I quote him in part:

The Truman administration is a serious menace to the American way of life. They have plunged us into the crisis and confusion of inflation. They have enslaved and burdened us with taxation. They have lowered the standard of living. In a few more years our bonds and savings will be worthless and we will be living in a state of peonage.

It is vain and futile for our children to consider the future for their careers have already been planned for them. They will police the world and fight wars wherever and whenever Stalin and Truman push a button.

Truman talks about freedom but we have no freedom. The Democrats yowl about the American way of life but it too has changed. Fourth of July orators speak about the American heritage for which our ancestors fought and bled but that priceless heritage today is merely a memory. Check through the statute books for abundant proof if you doubt me. The Fair Dealers have the gall and the guts to raise their voices in hypocritical protest against foreignisms, tyranny, and dictatorship in this so-called land of the free and the home of the brave. I say so-called land of the free and the home of the brave because it obviously no longer is free and brave. I don't think that our ancestors would have accepted the yoke so apathetically.

Our domestic policies rob, plunder, dispoil, and eventually enslave Americans. Our foreign policies are a dupe and a stooge for Stalin to pour American dollars down a rat hole in Europe and Asia which is senseless, illogical, and inane.

Poor old Al Capone. My heart bleeds for him. What a saint he was when compared to those who direct our foreign affairs.

Mr. Speaker, our foreign policies have failed. Who, in 1943, ever thought that we would send many billions to support the British Empire and its socialistic government. In fact we are supporting socialism all over Europe. Whoever dreamed we would think of sending American boys to die in Korea or to support French colonial rule in Indochina. Whoever thought we would make a complete surrender to communism at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if it is disunity to resist warmongers who would send our troops to defend Western Europe against communism when the nations directly threatened, so we are told, are apparently unwilling to do little to protect their own homes. The State Department would start us on a march to Moscow. They would continue to send replacements to Korea with full knowledge that eventually we must leave that graveyard which contains the bodies of many fine young Americans.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentlewoman from New York.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I, too, am one of the signatories to this declaration, and I want at this time particularly to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin for what he has said and for his masterful approach to this problem.

It seems to me that what we are really up against in this country is the fact that we are all disturbed because we do not know what the foreign policy of the United States is. I suspect that there is no well-defined foreign policy. This was forcibly brought out when President Rocsevelt some years ago made the statement, in a spirit of jocularity, that people were running up and down the United States asking bellhops what the foreign policy of the United States was. This was supposed to be very funny. But, as one who has lived a great deal in Europe it did not strike me as being funny at all, because if you were to ask a bellhop in England or in France or in Germany what the foreign policy of that nation was, I can assure you that he could give you a very intelligent answer. In those countries the people know what the foreign policy is. The great trouble, the great danger in the United States today is that our people do not know; that they are confused; that they are worried; that they do not know what their boys are fighting for; that they are told one minute by the Secretary of State that we are going into a great era of peace and 5 days later their sons are called to fight in Korea. They are told that this is not a war; that it is a police action, and yet replacements are being sent out there at the rate of 15,000 a month and the casualties now are 50,000 and maybe more.

So, it seems that this may be a war. Then again, what of Europe? There again we do not know. We heard General Eisenhower the other day, and at the end of his report I think very few Members of Congress and very few Americans knew much more than they did before. They heard a fine speech, well delivered by a charming personality, by a great patriot, if you will. But, he was in a position where probably he could tell us nothing. He was in uniform and he was taking orders. So we heard what he believed to be the case, but we had no

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, the Department of National Defense presented a report on the bill which I have introduced to authorize the enlistment of nationals of other countries in the Army of the United States. The Department said that they preferred to reserve final decision on the matter pending further investigation and asked that no action on the bill be taken at this time. I am glad the Department is ready to make further investigation. I am disappointed that the Department has not already investigated this matter over the number of years that have passed and it has not already recognized the importance of using German and Japanese nationals to do some of the fighting to protect this world from communism. I hope that when they have completed their investigation that they may come in with a recommendation that will encourage some of the other people of the world to do some of the fighting along with the American boys.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter, especially a resolution I am introducing today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 90 minutes.

DECLARATION OF FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to submit for the RECORD a statement on foreign policy signed at this moment by 118 Republican Members of this body. It should be clear that we do not speak for the Republican leadership. Nor has the statement been submitted to the Republican policy committee although some members of the committee have signed it. This matter, therefore, should not be considered as being sponsored by the Republican leadership. We fully realize that a division exists in our party on this issue. It is entirely possible that those who have signed are not in complete agreement. Some wanted to make it stronger; some thought that it should contain a definite reference to the war in Korea; some are opposed to sending large contingents of troops to Western Europe; others agree that this is necessary. Those who have signed it are at liberty to elaborate on the particular point that interests them most.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week I introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives calling on the President to consult the Congress before sending additional United States troops overseas. Certainly the American people are entitled to have their chosen legislative representatives consulted before American boys are sent across the water to fight on foreign soil. A matter of such gravity and importance should not be determined in the Pentagon nor in the executive offices alone, but should be decided in the open debate of the Congress by the representatives of the people of the United States.

Far from being an impediment to any military effort that is necessary, such consultation will strengthen the hand of the United States internationally and domestically as well. If the Congress decides this matter, or is consulted about it, as provided by my resolution, then we will have closed our ranks and foreclosed any division, both for ourselves and before all the world. In a representative government such as ours, it is the legislators chosen by the electorate who are directly answerable to the American people.

The debate that is now going on in the Congress concerning this and related matters is not a new subject in American political history. It represents the latest of a long series of struggles between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. Perhaps such a conflict is implicit in our Constitution which makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, but reserves to the Congress the power to declare war.

Never before, however, so far as I know, has an administration undertaken to ignore the Congress and commit the manpower and vast resources of the country to foreign fields without the consent of or consultation with the legislative body. Indeed, few Presidents would wish to assume such an enormous responsibility, in view of the possible consequences of such an act.

If this is a government of checks and balances as most of us believe it to be, here is one of the places where the check should be placed upon the improvident exercise of power by the Executive.

I also was a signatory to the declaration of policy signed by well over 100 Members of the House of Representatives. That declaration of policy is directly in line with the resolution which I introduced. It suggests that the future military and political policy of this country must be determined with the full participation and approval of the Congress.

In this critical hour in American history, with the menace of communism threatening western civilization, the responsibility for safeguarding America rests, not only upon the Executive but on the elected representatives of the people, and ultimately, upon all American citizens. Only by free and full discussion and debate, can a righteous and workable conclusion be reached which will enlist support and unflinching defense for the survival of American constitutional government.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observations.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I, too, am a signatory to this statement which I think covers the situation, but the point I want to make is this: The question in the minds of the American people today is a question as to how successful our foreign policy has been during the last 5 years. That question can only be answered by a statement of fact. The fact is that during these 5 years we have spent $100,000,000,000 in this so-called cold war to contain communism or fence it in and keep it from spreading. During the same 5 years Stalin has reached out his long arms and claws and taken into his orbit, taken into his sphere of influence, 600,000,000 more people, until today he has over 900,000,000 people that he is dictator over. He has also surrounded himself during those 5 years with satellite nations all around, and today he sits in Moscow just like a big fat spider in the middle of his web, and he pulls a string in Korea and the flames of war break out. We have to send our fire brigade there to put out the flames. When and if we get them out, he can and he will pull a string in Indochina or in Siam or in Turkey or Greece or in Berlin or Yugoslavia, and after 3 or 4 years of that where will we be? We will be bled white; and, without losing a man of his own, he will then be ready to take over. I ask you, has our foreign policy during the past 5 years been successful in view of that, and if it has not been successful, is it not time we changed the men who have been drawing up this blueprint of our foreign policy?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman want me to answer that?

Mr. MASON. I would like to have that answered.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Well, it is a big order, of course, but it seems to me that we have always considered that our diplomacy has failed when we have to rely upon the military. That is exactly the position we are in today.

Now I would like to proceed for a few minutes, and then I will be glad to yield to anybody who wants to ask me questions.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question at this time?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I am not unmindful, and I do not believe the rest of the membership of this House is unmindful of the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is, by far, the greatest authority on the real American approach to our foreign policy. I know all will agree when I say that his reasoning is always sound and logical and that he always bears in mind at all times what is best for America.

The question I wish to ask the gentleman is this: Many say that the slaughtering of tens of thousands of our boys in Korea is stopping the spread of communism; how is this slaughtering of our American boys 7,000 miles away stopping the spread of communism?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I do not think it is, if the gentleman please.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. As a good American I thought the gentleman would answer that way.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. Speaker, perilous days are ahead for the people of this country. Government propaganda is beating the war drums again as it did in 1917 and in 1939. People are alarmed and confused. They have lost confidence in the President and, yes, in Congress, too, and they are demanding that something be done to save them from total disaster. This is so because our foreign policy has been a complete failure, notwithstanding great victories on the battlefield. It has been well said that the fist of military mobilization is pounding hard at the door of millions of homes today. By and large the civilians have surrendered almost entirely to the demands of the military. Hence the worried parent and the perplexed youth feel that they are just being herded along without much planning or direction. They know that an emergency has been declared, but many doubt its necessity.

The three or four million manpower is to be added to our Military Establishment, yet reports reach their ears which cause disturbing questions. Millions of youths are having their lives, their careers, and their homes disrupted and shattered. Oh, yes, it will be said that our country is in danger and they cannot expect to enjoy living an ordinary life as usual. This in spite of the fact that military training camps already have more men now than they can handle. They are usually overcrowded with shortages of facilities and equipment which makes adequate training almost impossible. It is a known fact that the Navy, Marine, and Air Corps has had, and still have, more men than they can use. It is true that enlistments are up, but that is so because the boys have a certain pride and want to choose their branch of service rather than submit to the draft. What excuse, then, is there for now insisting upon the drafting of 18-year-old boys? The American people are waiting for an answer to that question.

Mr. Speaker, every Member of this body knows that the public is demanding action on our foreign policy. Mail is heavy with demands for removal and impeachment of Secretary of State Acheson. Since 1945 this Nation has been in the hands of Truman, Acheson, and Marshall, and now they are conjuring up another war.

One writer has said that these three form a triumvirate of mutual admiration. Truman calls Marshall the greatest living American. Marshall says that Truman is, and they both agree that Acheson is the third greatest living American. This writer goes on to say that—

> General Marshall is a good man and a patriot, but he is usually wrong. He can't remember where he was the night before Pearl Harbor. He sat at Roosevelt's side at Tehran when Stalin swiped half of Europe. He insisted upon giving Russia control of Manchuria in order to induce Russia to fight Japan. He wanted Chiang Kai-shek to coalesce with the Chinese Communists. He advised Truman to send troops to Europe.

Is there any doubt about the concern of the people.

Let me give you one illustration and I am sure it could be duplicated many times over. In the city of Aberdeen, Wash., two newspapers were so concerned about our foreign policy that they took a people's poll on questions relating to foreign policy. The Aberdeen Daily World and the Grays Harbor Washingtonian submitted seven questions to the people. You will be surprised at the results and I give them to you at this time. The result is based on a total of 2,345 ballots and the newspapers report they are still coming in.

	Yes	No
1. Do you favor the administration's foreign policy?	157	2,073
2. Do you favor Hoover's Western Hemisphere Gibraltar proposals?	776	539
3. Should this country order all-out mobilization (Dewey's plan)?	654	445
4. Do you think our foreign policy should be restudied and revised?	1,803	167
5. Do you favor holding Formosa and aiding Kai-shek?	754	385
6. Do you favor rearming Japan?	696	319
7. Do you favor rearming Germany?	620	484

A prominent citizen from my own district writes me as follows and I consider him a great American. I quote him in part:

> The Truman administration is a serious menace to the American way of life. They have plunged us into the crisis and confusion of inflation. They have enslaved and burdened us with taxation. They have lowered the standard of living. In a few more years our bonds and savings will be worthless and we will be living in a state of peonage.
> It is vain and futile for our children to consider the future for their careers have already been planned for them. They will police the world and fight wars wherever and whenever Stalin and Truman push a button.
> Truman talks about freedom but we have no freedom. The Democrats yowl about the American way of life but it too has changed. Fourth of July orators speak about the American heritage for which our ancestors fought and bled but that priceless heritage today is merely a memory. Check through the statute books for abundant proof if you doubt me. Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I, too, am one of the signatories to this declaration, and I want at this time particularly to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin for what he has said and for his masterful approach to this problem.

It seems to me that what we are really up against in this country is the fact that we are all disturbed because we do not know what the foreign policy of the United States is. I suspect that there is no well-defined foreign policy. This was forcibly brought out when President Roosevelt some years ago made the statement, in a spirit of jocularity, that people were running up and down the United States asking bellhops what the foreign policy of the United States was. This was supposed to be very funny. But, as one who has lived a great deal in Europe it did not strike me as being funny at all, because if you were to ask a bellhop in England or in France or in Germany what the foreign policy of that nation was, I can assure you that he could give you a very intelligent answer. They are told that this is not a war; that it is a police action, and yet replacements are being sent out there at the rate of 15,000 a month and the casualties now are 50,000 and maybe more.

So, it seems that this may be a war. Then again, what of Europe? There again we do not know. We heard General Eisenhower the other day, and at the end of his report I think very few Members of Congress and very few Americans knew much more than they did before. They heard a fine speech, well delivered by a charming personality, by a great patriot, if you will. But, he was in a position where probably he could tell us nothing. He was in uniform and he was taking orders. So we heard what he believed to be the case, but we had no positive facts. Within 2 days of that speech he heard from our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. His report was entirely different from the report given by General Eisenhower. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] had just returned from Europe. He was not sanguine as to the will to fight or the possibilities of the Western Europeans' putting men into the front-line trenches.

It seems to me that this declaration is most important in its first sentence, and that is where we say that whatever our future military or political policy is to be, it must be determined with full participation and approval of the Congress. If we are not to go back to that form of government, this Congress had better fold, because it is nothing better than the old German Reichstag. The Congress of the United States is the nearest thing we have in this country to the people themselves. We go back to the people every 2 years. We go back to them then for election, but we are in close touch with them all the time, every week and every day. We know about their daily lives, we know about their confusion, about their frustration, about their alarm. We know about their worries over this terrible inflation and this high cost of living. We know as we read these letters what may be in store for this country, because everytime I read one of them the words of Lenin come back to me, "The only way to destroy the United States is to make her bleed herself white." We are going along that path today.

Some will say that it is too strong to say that we will refuse further aid of any kind to Western Europe unless persuaded that Western Europe is carrying its full share of the burden. I do not think that is too strong. Surely we all know that you cannot help anyone who does not want to help himself. We must be sure and we must be persuaded that these people want our help before we go out and force it upon them.

What are these stories, and they are well authenticated stories, too, that come from Western Europe. How about the French who say, "France never wants to be liberated again." You know, liberation today, under modern conditions and in a modern war, is not a very pleasant pastime. I do not think we here in Washington would be very pleased if our liberators came over in swarms and dropped bombs, atom bombs, possibly, all over this Nation's capital, and then turned to us and said, "But you are being liberated." No, it is a case of the medicine being worse than the disease.

So it seems to me the Western Europeans themselves have the right to decide whether they want our help. The only way they can show that they want it is by coming out and assuring us that they will go along shoulder to shoulder, taking up their full share of the burden.

Our last state will be worse than our first if we send American troops to Europe, merely a token, because that is all they will be against the 173 divisions that Russia has ready to spring there. If we send those boys over there and our allies are not willing at the last minute to shoulder their share of the burden, those boys will be liquidated and in a most horrible fashion, because we know that those that survive will be taken into Russia as hostages. All of you have read what happens in Russian prison camps.

No, that language is not too strong. Then again the important part in that fifth clause is that we invite Britain and the Commonwealth of Nations to participate fully. We cannot defend the world without friends. We need the British Commonwealth of Nations. We need Canada to the north of us. We need Australia, New Zealand, and the other bases which Great Britain has all over the world. We must count on Britain and the Commonwealth as our friends. If they are not our friends we had better retire to this hemisphere and give up the fight. Our friends are few and very far between. We have people who are envious of us. We have people who will take our money, but we have very few people who will fight with us today.

All this talk about Germany—who knows that Western Germany will fight? I think that is a very questionable thing. From what I hear, and from the German broadcasts I have listened to, I think Germany takes the attitude, "You wanted to make us into a goat pasture—now see how well goats will fight." I do not believe they are so anxious to come in on our side at all.

So here we have come to the point where we are trying to tell the people of the United States that we have got a declaration of foreign policy; that some of us would like to go on from here in our different ways, but bearing these few simple six points in our minds. The final one of those points is probably the most important because without it we can go nowhere. And that is that we should write peace treaties, and write them now, with Germany, Austria, and Japan; so that we can give those people an opportunity, as first-class powers, to come in again alongside of us for this fight, which we are prepared to wage; but only on one condition, that those who believe as we do, that those we believe in peace and honor and decency are willing to stand up now and be counted. We cannot do it alone. Yes, we can keep our own Nation all to ourselves—and probably the Western Hemisphere. But that is not what we want. We have come to the time now, Mr. Speaker, where we have to do what we can and not what we want.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Let us never forget, Mr. Speaker, that the United States has supplied the decisive men, munitions, and wealth to win two world wars and our success has virtually inflated our ego and swollen our national pride. But against row upon row of countless white crosses in military cemeteries around the world as the wastage of the greater part of the natural resources of a continent loaded with a fantastic national debt of nearly $270,000,000,000.

Just this morning we were advised in the press that the Secretary of the Interior calls attention to the fact that we are very rapidly depleting those natural resources. And what have we gained? Nothing. Only more war and more war, more taxes, more regimentation, and the imposition of militarism, if you please, on this country, from which there will be no permanent escape.

The die has been cast. It is important that this Congress rise up and fight every measure which continues the present foreign policy of this country which is leading us to total destruction.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at the end of my remarks a copy of the declaration of policy which has been signed by 118 Members of the House, together with a list by States of those Members who are signatories to the declaration, and a portion of a short ad, entitled "Stop, Look, and Listen," by Mr. Frank H. Lamb, of Hoquiam, Wash., a great patriot.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MORRIS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

A DECLARATION OF POLICY

We, the undersigned, conceive that the present position of the United States is dangerous and its future tragic unless the Congress immediately undertakes a reexamination and revision of a foreign policy that in large part has been a costly failure. We submit the following as a suggested basis for our foreign policy:

1. Whatever our future military or political policy is to be, it must be determined with the full participation and approval of the Congress.

2. Make this country impregnable to attack.

3. Reduce nonessential civilian expenditures.

4. Build a strong defense system in the Western Hemisphere.

5. Establish a strong defense line in the Atlantic and Pacific. Refuse further aid of any kind to Western Europe unless persuaded that Western Europe is carrying its full share of the burden. In any case invite Britain and the British Commonwealth of Nations to participate fully in this program.

6. Conclude peace treaties with Germany, Japan, and Austria.

Those who share our views are invited to join us in a fight for survival of American constitutional government and for America itself.

STOP, LOOK, LISTEN

(A New Year's contribution and appeal from Frank H. Lamb, Hoquiam, Wash.)

Parents of today and of generations yet unborn, are you raising your children for a normal life of work and service or to perish on some foreign battlefield?

Workers in field, factory, or office, are you laboring for a higher standard of living, the necessities of family and old age, or producing battle spoil to be spread around the world?

Businessmen, would you rather trade in or make articles for more human comfort and enjoyment for education, culture, and recreation or machinery, guns, bombs, poisons for the wholesale destruction of life?

Widows, orphans, aged, heads of endowed schools and foundations, all those depending on savings, annuities, bonds, fixed income, or insurance, will you be able to live on the provisions you or others have made for your future, or will all your bonds, endowments, reserves, and assets be wiped out by an inflation that has already reduced the value of the dollar to half what it was a decade ago?

These questions and others equally as critical are being decided today with little reference to you and on superficial congressional consideration by an administration dominated by military men (Generals Marshall, Eisenhower, and MacArthur, for example) headed by a President prone to bombast and snap judgments ("We can lick old Joe," and some recent letters) and supported by a flock of columnists to whom war will offer opportunities for advancement.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. McDONOUGH. In the statement you referred to the fact that Congressmen must be persuaded that there is aid coming from Europe. I think you should change that to "convince." That will be more effective. If you will agree to the suggestion, I think it would be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. We are happy to have the gentleman's suggestion. I do not want to take the responsibility for making such a change, however.

I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWE].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield to me for an observation?

Mr. TOWE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am not one of the signers of the instrument to which the gentleman refers. However, I would like him to know that that document is not without sympathy or support on this side of the aisle. I agree thoroughly with the contents of that instrument. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the mail that I receive in my office is an accurate barometer of public opinion, the American public has lost confidence in its top executive leadership, and is now looking to the Congress of the United States to bring it out of this haze of international confusion in which it has been groping for the last 5 or 6 years. I think the Congress has no honorable alternative but to accept that responsibility.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In Michigan we have a State-wide election on April 1. Will the gentleman express an opinion, as to how many of the Members of this House, and perhaps the President himself, would advocate a war either in Korea, Asia, or in Europe if he had to stand for reelection on April 1 next?

Mr. TOWE. I do not believe any of them would, except those who come from States where you can get both nominations. They might, if you could find anybody in those States of that persuasion.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not believe they would even in those States. Our people do not want war. They do not have confidence in Acheson or the State Department.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not mean to have the RECORD show that he would vote only for his next election rather than for the interest of the country.

Mr. TOWE. The gentleman was not expressing his own opinion. He was answering the question which the gentleman from Michigan asked.

Mr. McCORMACK. Your answer was that you were thinking of the next election.

Mr. TOWE. I said nothing of the sort. The RECORD will not show that I said that.

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWE. I yield.

Mr. DORN. I would like to say to the distinguished gentleman that this country is alarmed today as never before in the history of the United States, and the people are alarmed because in this generation we have seen two world wars, and some of this antique leadership is leading us into a third world war. We have listened to the experts now for 30 or 40 years, and now we are willing, and we hope that the voice of the American people will be heard once on international policy.

I want to say this, that I have 30 minutes tomorrow, and I am not to speak from any notes, and I will welcome the gentlemen from that side of the aisle to hear what I have to say tomorrow. I was in Europe as an enlisted man. I did not go to the cocktail parties in London and Paris. I saw Europe from Normandy all the way to Stassfurt, Germany, on the under side, and I hope you gentlemen will come out tomorrow and hear my report to this august body and to the people of the United States of America.

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who signed this document and, of course, I speak only for myself as each will when he has the opportunity. Those of us who are interested in making the declaration do so out of an intense desire to be of some help to the leadership of this country and, if possible, to reflect as accurately as we can the feeling that we believe is in the minds and hearts of a great majority of the American people today.

As far as I am concerned, the declaration was not conceived or signed for the purpose of being destructively critical; my purpose was to do what little I could, as I know every other Member wants to do, to help his country, the country that we all love and the country that we want to preserve if possible. We are disturbed, as the American people are, at the course and trend of events today. We find that we are about, if the executive branch of the Government remains in absolute control of the situation, we are about to send huge numbers of men, ground troops especially, to Europe. That obviously is the plan, and that statement comes as a result of my conclusion after listening to testimony for about 1 month on the proposed draft law, if we are going to increase the size of our services to the extent desired or requested. They certainly are not being called into service for the purpose of maintaining strength in this country. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the American people, acting through their Representatives in Congress, at least have some responsibility to make their own decision rather than to be led into a situation from which it may be impossible to turn back when it is too late.

It is interesting to note, I think, that those who now advocate the policy under which we are operating are the same ones—most, if not all—who precipitated, or at least their philosophy directed, this country into going into the war back in 1941 on the side of Russia. It was predicted then by a gentleman who is now making known his position on the present situation that if we did that, we would not only make it possible for Russia to defeat Germany but we would also build up the strength of that country so that she would be able to impose her will on many other nations throughout the world; and, of course, that has come to pass. I speak, of course, of former President Hoover, who is now rendering, in my opinion, a great service to the American people by provoking discussion and debate. It is possible that his viewpoint will not be agreed upon by all; and I know very well as I stand here that I may be wrong about what I am advocating, but I have the intense desire to do what I can. As I said a few moments ago, I think we ought to review the record as we have seen it in the past.

The people of this country were told—and I was convinced somewhat by it, I must admit—that if we would establish the Marshall plan program, we would be able to get the economies of Europe back to normal. We were told further that if we did that, we would make them strong enough so that they could resist Communist aggression. We were also told that it would obviate the necessity of maintaining a huge military establishment in this country or sending one abroad. We adopted the Marshall plan. How many billions of dollars we have spent, I do not know. Then we went further and joined the United Nations and participated in its deliberations. I think that was a laudable effort on our part, because I thought at that time it might possibly produce an organization which would result in the countries of the world airing their differences and then coming to some agreement and preventing war; I thought it would further peace. We find that in the very first serious test of the strength of that Organization we are standing practically alone in Korea, and we are suffering great losses.

While I am on that point I would like to refer back for a moment to the observation which the gentlewoman from New York made about the price of being liberated. I read the other day in the newspaper about the terrific casualties to the Korean people, largely the South Koreans, those we went in there to help out of their difficulties. The casualties run into the hundreds of thousands. I agree completely with the statement which the gentlewoman from New York made that the price of being liberated might be worse than the disease which we are trying to free them from.

We are told in connection with the inability of France and England especially to help us in Korea that those nations are busy, one in India and one in Indochina. I do not contest that statement but I would like to know, if they are busy there, and it is a safe bet that Mr. Stalin will keep them occupied there as long as he can, how in the face of that difficulty which they have on their hands they are going to supply great numbers of troops for the army of Europe?

We are told by General Eisenhower, and I have great respect for him as a military man, that we are going to provide a minimum of men, but our effort, and I am sure this is a fair deduction from what he said, will largely be in matériel. I would like to repeat the question, and I want someone to answer it, How is Britain, how is France, going to supply a great army of men to participate with us in the event that we send our men over there? Everyone knows that they are the two large manpower pools in Europe. If they cannot do the job, then we are going to be standing alone, I fear, if we become involved.

It is significant to me, at least, from some of the discussions which have been had lately that General Eisenhower completely omitted any discussions with Spain. We are told by military leaders and by others that they have perhaps the finest army in Europe, 500,000 to 600,000 well-trained troops. It may be appropriate to comment at this time that that is one country in Europe that is anxious to fight against the Communists. That country is anxious to do that. We need not spend a lot of time and effort prodding them should the occasion arrive.

When General Eisenhower went to Europe, he did not go to Madrid. He went to Portugal. They said to him, "Well, you cannot talk to us unless Spain is in on this arrangement because our economy and all of our interests are so tightly interwoven with theirs that unless they are involved we cannot be."

It is difficult for me to understand how when a serious situation confronts us such as we are told is before us at this time we rush in pell-mell taking in 18-year-olds and everybody else who can render any kind of military service. We are putting our country under complete economic controls—we will shortly if not immediately. Here is a great country that is willing to fight. The general's answer was that that country was not on his itinerary. In other words, there are those in Europe, and I suspect some people in this country, who are in position of importance and power, who are not willing yet, for some reason or other to take that nation into the arrangement in order to prevent the spread of Communist aggression in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the American people are entitled to have some voice in the manner in which they are governed, of course, and in the manner in which the executive branch of our Government may use our Army and our Navy and our Air Force. I do not think it was ever intended that any President of the United States should have the power to send an army to foreign countries without a declaration of war by the Congress of the United States. I hope that through this discussion and the one which is taking place in the other body that we can arrive at some solution which will be understood by the people. I think, in the first place, the people are entitled to have all the information that is available so that they may know what they are getting into, and I hope also that we can arrive at a conclusion not only in the interest of our country—of course, it should be that, but it should be largely, as far as possible, in the interest of those other countries of the world who want to remain free and are willing to do something about it.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in listening to the enlightened remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, particularly with respect to his reference to the position of Spain. As the gentleman may know, I have for some time sought to exert what efforts I could in normalizing the diplomatic and commercial relations between Spain and the United States. What the gentleman says with respect to the military position of Spain cannot, in my opinion, be gainsaid. In fact the advantage to our ultimate security to be derived from the inclusion of Spain is generally conceded by all experts. We have for a number of years, however, adopted what, in my opinion, is a singular attitude toward this country. We have applied against it in determining our diplomatic and commercial relations standards different from those which we have applied against other countries all of which is not in the best interests of the United States. The Spanish people are historically connected with us by ties of friendship and blood. Their views are, generally, the views of the average American and to them as to the people of this country and even of the people of India, hardships that flow from undernourishment knows no boundaries.

The current wheat position in Spain is most critical. The seriousness of the problem for the next 5 months cannot be overemphasized. The Spanish Government's efforts to bring more wheat into the free market has successfully reduced black-market transactions, and has established a fuller and more effective distribution to urban industrial workers at a satisfactory price. This is all to the good—but it has reduced the amount of wheat now available to meet the essential demands for the next 5- to 6-month period. This is so because by successfully inducing the wheat flow to the market for consumption during the past months, less wheat remains over which the Government has the powers of control which might be exercised.

It is essential, therefore, that Spain obtain, not later than the latter half of February, 50,000 to 70,000 metric tons of wheat for delivery in early March. It is essential that Spain obtain approximately 300,000 metric tons of wheat, including the 50,000 referred to above, for delivery during the months of March to May.

The Spanish Government is prepared to arrange for the financing directly of $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 worth of wheat; it cannot do more than this. Yet the critical needs are clear—Spain requires more wheat than can be obtained with that sum of money.

This brings out clearly why Dr. Sunez, Spanish Under Secretary of Industry and Commerce, requested initially that $8,000,000 of the authorized $62,500,000 be utilized for wheat purchases in the United States markets of approximately 100,000 metric tons. Taking into consideration the position of the United States Government, as explained by officials of the Export-Import Bank, the request has now been reduced to $5,000,000 to be made available now. This is the very basic minimum of assistance required for wheat purchases.

The Export-Import Bank has under consideration a request by the Spanish Government to use $5,000,000 of the $62,500,000 for the purchase of wheat. Difficulties encountered in obtaining this approval spring from the fact that it is erroneously contended by the bank that the use of the money for the purchase of wheat would be inconsistent with the spirit of the loan. That, in my opinion, was not the intent of the Congress in enacting the loan. Even if Spain, with the essentially required assistance of the Export-Import Bank, is able to obtain 300,000 metric tons of wheat imports during this period, its total wheat supply will not be more than 3,331,673 metric tons, which at best will be over 100,000 metric tons less than was available for 1948–49.

It is hoped that when the Congress considers legislation for relieving famine-stricken people consideration will be given to the 28,266,518 people of Spain who represent a strong bulwark against any ideology foreign to our democratic institutions.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JONAS. I would like to ask this question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I preface it with a short statement. There is no doubt but what the treatise of the gentleman presented to the floor today is one that probably will be long remembered, and he is to be commended for the splendid way in which he has analyzed that very important subject, which is also very close to the hearts of the American people and which is invoking this great widespread interest throughout the whole country. What he said is exactly what the people in my district and my constituents are pleading for in the line of relief; there is no question about it. I think it is a very fine gesture for the gentleman from Wisconsin to appear here and take this time and make such a keen analysis of this very interesting and very, very pressing subject before us.

Now here is my question: Assuming that the problems that the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin has presented here so ably today all have merit—and I am sure they have merit, and I think even our adversaries will agree that they have a great deal of merit—from a standpoint of relief what can we do in Congress, or what can we do in the House, or what can any public official do, clothed with the authority that we are clothed with as Representatives here, to give the people the relief they are seeking at the present time. How can we do away with some of the conditions that prompt the heart-rending appeals that we receive from our constituents, in light of the fact that we are today being governed by the UN Charter which was adopted by the other body on July 28, 1945, by a vote of 89 to 2, which confirmed and approved everything that was in the Charter of the United Nations? That is No. 1.

No. 2: What relief presently can we hope to get or seek, and what deterrent can be put in the way of this present program that is being promulgated here and being put into effect as long as we have what is known as the Atlantic Peace Pact Treaty which has been adopted? Assuming all of these suggestions that the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin makes, are all very pertinent and very much to the point, but in the light of these two great legislative barriers, what can we do to alleviate and give the people the help that they are beseeching us for, and what can we hope to accomplish until someone has the courage—and I have never yet seen anyone get up in the House to do that—to determine or analyze what in the United Nations Charter confers upon the President of the United States the power to declare war, and what is there in the Atlantic Treaty Pact that permits him to send armies to Europe? It would appear here that practically all of us, some by negation and others by public utterances, are giving countenance to the fact that under the United Nations he can do just that—declare secondary war, and not only that, but send troops to Europe, because we have entered into a combination, a confederation, under which the people of the United States are obligated, in writing, to send troops to Europe, and to other continents as well.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONAS. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman will get the answers if he will look at the debate on both those things over in the other body. We are not obligated by the Atlantic Pact to send troops anywhere.

Mr. JONAS. That is just debate. We are not getting anywhere debating. We have been debating this question for weeks and months not only in this session but in the prior sessions, and we are not giving the people any relief. We are just talking and talking and talking. But what is there that relieves these people of the responsibility of sending 18-year-old boys to war and of having their taxes jacked up in the light of these war measures, and what is it we are doing from a concrete standpoint that will give the people relief?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Neither of the documents to which the gentleman referred gives the authority to the President to send a single soldier across the seas. If the people back home will put the heat on the Congressmen and the Senators who advocate this policy of carrying on these two wars, you will see a change right on the floor of this and the other body.

Mr. JONAS. Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan a question relative to the statement he is making. Is it not true that the President of the United States is declaring secondary war, and that he is sending troops over to the European shores?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Sure; and we do not have the courage to do anything about it.

Mr. JONAS. That is exactly the point I am making.

Mr. McKINNON. If the gentleman will yield, does the gentleman from Illinois advocate that we withdraw our troops from Germany?

Mr. JONAS. I do not advocate anything that has to do with what we have done. I want at this time to analyze the situation in the light of what we are trying to do. In one breath we say the President does not have the power and in the other we say he does. I should like to see some expression in the House that would immediately and definitely settle the question of whether the President has the unlimited and unrestricted powers that he is and has exercised to date.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. May I say that the 118 people who signed this declaration are for doing something. We would be pleased to have the gentleman's signature on that list.

Mr. JONAS. I do not know about the effectiveness of signing something, but I will be glad to vote for what you are trying to do if you will do what you are talking about.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my colleague from Wisconsin for yielding me a few minutes to express my views in connection with the statement of principle to which I have subscribed. The statement, of course, is one which had to be in broad, general language. As the gentleman from Wisconsin has stated, many of us have disagreed, perhaps, on votes on previous issues affecting foreign policy. However, I think it is a great expression of the soul-searching desire of the Members of Congress in connection with this tremendously important problem to agree upon a statement of principles, principles to which I, at least, subscribe. The principal purpose is the welfare not only of the United States of America but of the civilized world.

Mr. Speaker, my mail of the last 2 months has been the heaviest and the most disturbing in my almost 11 years of continuous service in Congress. The people ask, "Where are we going? What are you doing to direct our destinies that involve the lives of our sons, or our brothers, or our husbands? What are you doing to get us out of the mess we are in?"

What have we had? Why, going back to lend-lease when I first came to the Congress, I remember how all of the arguments of propaganda were turned loose: That first we were to furnish the money; then the tools; then they said, "We have to have your youth and your men." I think it would have been far more honest had we gone into it openly and said to the people of this country, "This means a declaration of war." Tragically, the various programs we have had under the guise of this or that appealing program, such as the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, the United Nations, and so forth, added to Yalta and Tehran and Potsdam, is why, ladies' and gentlemen of the House, we are in the condition which confronts us today.

Is what we do next a subterfuge for a declaration or a commitment which will lead us directly into world war III? How many more thousands are going to die in Korea? To what extent can we expend our blood and our resources, not only in arming ourselves, but those whom we choose to call our allies today?

Mr. Speaker, I think the hour is the most critical one in the entire history of America. The American people are so disturbed that when they have an opportunity to express their opinions, both in letters to their Congressmen, or when they have an opportunity to express their opinions through the medium of an honestly conducted public opinion poll, they overwhelmingly, at least in our part of the country, are in favor of getting out of Korea. In a poll which was conducted in my district 97 percent of the people said that Congress should have the authority to determine whether troops are to be sent overseas—and that does not mean merely the replacement of garrison forces in Germany. The Korean situation has left a terrific impression upon the people and they see great danger in that situation to the American people. Eighty-nine percent of the poll favored getting out of Korea.

Mr. Speaker, it is our responsibility, as Congress, no matter which side of the aisle we sit on, to see that we are not getting sucked into another maelstrom. I say to you, with all the power at my command and with the deepest conviction that if we get into world war III in the immediate future it can mean nothing but the economic destruction of this country which is exactly what Stalin and the Politburo want to see happen. I think the people of this country are crying aloud to the Congress to assert itself. If it does not, they have lost faith in us, their representatives. Our greatest responsibility is to represent them, not necessarily in a complete agreement, but to represent them in the expression of the disturbed conditions of their minds upon this problem. I say it is up to us, and we cannot dodge it, to assert ourselves, and to insist that in any determination that is to be made on foreign policy, any determination that involves the sending of American youth from this country, we shall have the last word. Otherwise, what are we to become? An idle appropriation committee that says, "Yes, we will give you what you want." I say, Mr. Speaker, in all the seriousness at my command, the time is now for us to act.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. JONAS. I have this question in mind, and I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota whether it is his contention that the Charter and the powers set forth therein is in the United Nations or does not confer upon that body the right to declare a blockade or to call out the Air Force or to declare what is akin to open hostilities anywhere, if they say there is a violation of the aggression rule. I presume the gentleman is familiar with that section.

Mr. O'HARA. I am familiar with it. But permit me to say I would prefer that the gentleman permit me to answer at some other time. There are others to whom time has been promised. I say it is obvious that the United Nations claims to have something to do with the control of military operations in Korea and in the determination of whether they shall go beyond or not go beyond the thirty-eighth parallel. With us fighting 98 percent of the war over there and doing the principal part of the fighting and dying and paying, it is a little ridiculous to me, but apparently the power is there for them to determine.

Mr. JONAS. I agree with the gentleman that the way the situation is managed it is very unfortunate.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I must yield to the majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think a constructive approach would be to see what the areas of agreement are rather than the areas of disagreement. Does the gentleman advocate our withdrawing completely from Europe?

Mr. O'HARA. No, I do not necessarily mean that; but, of course, to what extent?

Mr. McCORMACK. But that is the question. Who is going to determine that?

Mr. O'HARA. No. I do not say that we should completely withdraw from Europe. From past experience, the President will not consult me about it either.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's argument would leave that impression.

Mr. O'HARA. I did not mean to leave that impression.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad to hear that. That is one area of agreement. To what extent should we keep our troops in Germany that are there now?

Mr. O'HARA. I think that is a question of policy, as to whether it is necessary. I have not passed upon that question as yet. I am not passing on it now. Will I have, in the light of the past, an opportunity?

Mr. McCORMACK. Who would determine that?

Mr. O'HARA. The Congress should.

Mr. McCORMACK. What about the Chiefs of Staff?

Mr. O'HARA. Now, let me say to my friend I am not subscribing to the idea that the military is running this country.

Mr. McCORMACK. Nobody does.

Mr. O'HARA. And I never shall. I leave it to the military to make decisions on matters pertaining to the military, but that, over-all, the Congress makes final decision.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the President, under the Constitution, has certain prerogatives and duties.

Mr. O'HARA. Oh, I recognize that.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, is it fair to say that the gentleman feels there should be that cooperation of all, and understanding of all, and advice from military sources as to what should be done?

Mr. O'HARA. I think that instead of the Executive, military, and State Department making some of these decisions as they have time and again before they have advised with either the military or Foreign Affairs Committee or the Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is being done all the time.

Mr. O'HARA. Oh, no.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not feel, then, that we should withdraw completely from Europe?

Mr. O'HARA. I answered that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; there is at least one area of agreement. Does the gentleman believe that we should withdraw from Asia, from Korea?

Mr. O'HARA. In the light of the feeling of the people of my district I would have to say——

Mr. McCORMACK. No; how does the gentleman feel himself? The gentleman is presenting this argument. Does the gentleman vote on feeling or does he vote his own conviction and judgment?

Mr. O'HARA. Will the gentlemen confine himself to a question and not an argument? I will say, yes; I would withdraw from Korea today.

Mr. McCORMACK. Based on your own judgment?

Mr. O'HARA. Based on my own judgment.

Mr. McCORMACK. I see; that is an answer. Based on the gentleman's own judgment would he withdraw from the rest of the Far East?

Mr. O'HARA. I would not go that far; I would not go that far. I would like to have the opportunity of making the decision as a Member of the House, instead of it being made by some one or some few downtown. That should be the job for Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be in order here to call this to your mind, that by no stretch of anyone's imagination can this administration be relieved of the responsibility in regard to the situation we face in Asia, and that is why I wish to direct your attention for a few minutes to the reasons why we are in the situation in which we find ourselves in the world today.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. HILL. I yield briefly.

Mr. JENSEN. Is it not a fact that up to this time, regardless of what we Members of Congress think or have been thinking, the administration has paid no attention whatever to us, has paid no attention to the Congress? And that is why this group decided they would do something about it by signing this declaration.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is correct, but they will probably pay as little attention to us in the future as they have in the past.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. In the last analysis, when we evaluate the situation and find the Congress subservient to the administrative branch of the Government, taking over and exercising powers that were allocated to the Congress in the Constitution; do we not find that that situation came about because of legislation passed by the Congress giving blanket authority to the President to do the things that the Congress itself was supposed to do for the people who represent them? Is not the remedy to this situation a determination on the part of the Congress itself to take back the powers reposed in them by the Constitution, legislating as we are supposed to legislate, and exercising the powers the Congress alone is supposed to exercise? Is not that the real solution to this problem?

As long as we leave it where it is and let the administrative branch of the Government override the Congress, let the Congress be subservient to and take orders from the administration, there can be no relief for the American people. Is that not correct?

Mr. HILL. That is correct.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. And is not this statement signed by 118 Members of Congress a very laudable thing? Is that not what you are driving at?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; and I would like to add this further thought, that we cannot as a Congress act intelligently on these measures that are before us unless we know the history behind it. I want to give you just a little insight into what has brought this about, for I feel the lack of that knowledge is one of our great difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, in November 1943, at the Cairo Conference we said to Gen. Chiang Kai-shek "that all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores shall be restored to the Republic of China. In due course, Korea shall become free and independent."

The year 1944 saw the great Allied offensive launched in Europe. In the Pacific, American forces inched toward the Philippines; while on the mainland, heroic China held the Jap invaders. At the year's end, British and American forces were at the Rhine, and Russia was knocking at Poland's door.

In February 1945, with Germany only needing the knockout blow, the Allies sat down at a conference table in the Crimean city of Yalta, on the Black Sea. For Russia there were Premier Stalin, Molotov, Gromyko, Vishinski, and Gusev. For Britain there were Churchill, Eden, Cadogan, Kerr, and Bridges. For the United States there were President Roosevelt, Byrnes, Hopkins, Stettinius, and Alger Hiss. China was left at home.

On February 11, the Yalta conferees announced they had reached an agreement. They revealed to the public that occupation plans for Germany had been decided upon, that the date for organizing the United Nations had been set, that an agreement had been reached calling for free elections for liberated peoples, that in response to Russian demands, Poland would be partitioned, with the Russians gaining a large slice of that beleaguered country, and finally, that Russia's demands had been met for the establishment of a Polish provisional government "to be organized on a broader democratic basis," meaning that Communists would be admitted. The world hailed these decisions as the blueprint for peace.

On the morning of February 23, 1945, President Roosevelt held a press conference. As reported in the New York Times the following day, the headline read, "Roosevelt back; speaks to Congress today." A smaller headline read, "Prophecy of peace; President hopeful for future; thinks arms cuts may come later; hails Yalta plans." Those were the headlines. But buried 13 pages away in the story in the New York Times was this little-noticed paragraph. Here is what that paragraph said:

> The President's report to Congress on his victory and peace mission to the Crimea tomorrow will not tell all. Some understandings reached at the Big Three meetings on the Black Sea were secret, he said. Whether these involved political or military arrangements, or both, was part of the secrecy.

The world was to learn that there were secret agreements, and that they were not military, but political.

The first glimpse came with the disclosure, bit by bit, that at Yalta the following agreements had been entered into but not immediately made public. First, the world learned that the veto power had been set up in the United Nations, a weapon, incidentally, which has been used by Russia time and time again to block action in that body. Next, it was disclosed that under a special arrangement, Russia had been granted three votes in the UN, a preferred treatment accorded no other nation. Later, it leaked out that at Yalta, German reparations had been agreed upon and fixed at $20,000,000,000, with the Soviet Union to get half, the other Allies being forced to share what was left. But Yalta's deepest secrets were yet to be uncovered.

Under the terms of this secret agreement, Russia was given control of Outer Mongolia, Port Arthur, Dairen, Manchuria, the Sakhalins, and the Kuriles. China, which had fought for eight long years to regain Manchuria, had not even been consulted or advised.

To carry out this secret Yalta deal, President Roosevelt had agreed to force China to accept the terms, notwithstanding the solemn Cairo pledge 14 months earlier restoring the boundaries of China and returning Manchuria to the Chinese people. The exact words of this enforcement section of the secret Yalta agreement are to be found in the text which was finally published by the State Department, March 24, 1947, 2 years after the deal had been consummated behind locked doors at Yalta:

> It is understood that the agreement concerning Outer Mongolia and the ports and railroads referred to above will require concurrence of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. The President will take measures in order to obtain this concurrence, on advice from Marshal Stalin. The heads of the three great powers have agreed that these claims of the Soviet Union shall be unquestionably fulfilled after Japan has been defeated.

On December 15, 1945, came China's most crushing blow—President Truman's announcement cutting off United States aid unless Communists were admitted to the Government of China. Simultaneously, President Truman sent General Marshall to order a truce and to carry out his demand.

General Marshall, obeying the orders of his Commander in Chief, forced a truce at a time when Chiang Kai-shek's troops were winning. General Marshall did this by cutting off United States aid, placing an embargo on China's military purchases in the United States, scuttling a 1945 agreement between China and the United States whereby the United States would supply the Government of China with an air force of eight and one-third groups after the war was over, stalling discussion on a proposed half billion dollar loan which had been promised the Chinese, demanding that the Chinese Air Force, the most potent weapon against the Reds, be grounded.

The history of these disastrous steps has been set down in plain language by one of the great generals of World War II, General Chennault, who organized and commanded the famous Flying Tigers, who fought so brilliantly in China. In his book The Way of a Fighter, General Chennault has written:

> Some 50 truce teams each were dispatched to trouble spots all over China. Each was headed by an elderly American colonel specially picked for his white hair to impress the Chinese. Here are some specific examples of what they accomplished:
> North of Hankow, some 200,000 government troops had surrounded 70,000 Communist troops and were beginning a methodical job of extermination. Arrangements were made for fighting to cease, while the Communists marched out of the trap and on to the Shantung Province, where a large Communist offensive began about a year later. On the East River near Canton, some 100,000 Communist troops were trapped by government forces. Truce teams allowed the Communists to march unmolested to Bias Bay, where they sailed to Shantung.
> The worst fiasco was at Kalgan Pass, a historic gateway between China and Manchuria. At the end of the war there were no organized Communists in Manchuria. Early in 1946, a Government offensive captured Kalgan and sealed off the pass, trapping nearly a million Chinese Communists in northwest China who were moving toward Manchuria. Marshall made strenuous efforts to open the Kalgan Pass for these Communists. Eventually the Government withdrew, and the Communist horde poured into Manchuria. The Communists then broke the truce by fortifying Kalgan Pass. It was these troops who marched under a safe conduct of the American-sponsored truce through Kalgan Pass and returned with Japanese arms, supplied by Russia, that won the decisive battles in Manchuria in 1947.

Those are the words of General Chennault.

While the United States promoted a truce, the Russia Red Army was systematically looting the Jap arsenal in Manchuria. Guns, tanks, and planes were seized; entire war plants and whole industries were stripped and dismantled. The Red Army took 90 percent of the machinery of the coal industry, 80 percent of the metal-working industry, 75 percent of the textile industry, and 50 percent and up of the chemical, cement, power, railroad, and steel industries. Edwin W. Pauley, President Truman's reparations expert, put the over-all loot at $2,000,000,000.

For the Chinese Reds, the American-ordered truce was a godsend, because, according to General Chennault, out of Russia's Manchurian booty, the Chinese Communist Army was given sufficient Jap arms to supply a million men for 10 years of fighting. It was these arms that sealed the fate of China.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to express to the Congress of the United States the concern of the people of this country, the concern that grips my district, over the foreign and war policies of the administration. Every day since January 3, for six long weeks, telephone calls, letters, and telegrams have come in a deluge, all saying the same thing: "We are worried; we are frightened; we are angry." And, this: "What are you going to do about it?" Now, I cannot believe that such letters come merely to our side of the aisle. I cannot believe that anywhere in the United States today there is a thoughtful person—and people are thinking—who does not recognize with just trepidation the national and the personal crisis that we are facing. So, when the opportunity came for me to read and sign this statement of policy, I looked at it very carefully. It seemed to me that the circulation of this statement constituted the first honest, constructive effort that had been made to ascertain the feeling of this Congress. I am simple enough to wish very much that we might have a symposium on foreign policy in this Congress without regard to party lines and in which every one of us would stand up and say honestly what our people are thinking and what we are thinking; and perhaps work out a plan that would be truly American. They tell me that is too utopian a dream to be accomplished in the United States Congress.

The people are frightened, and I share their fear. I happen to have lived here in Washington during a depression; a world war; what we thought was a victory; and this terrible present war. I can say to you what in my heart I know to be true. Never, never in any other crisis—and there have been many of them—has there been such reason for fear. Even during World War II, bitter as those days were, we knew two things. First we knew where we were going. We had a definite goal. And, second, it never occurred to our strong American hearts that we would not win that goal. Now, what my constituents and your constituents are telling us is this: We do not know where this country is going. We only know that present leadership seems to be taking us somewhere, too fast, and with a note of panic. Now, I very much agree with the wise gentleman from Illinois who earlier said, "What are you going to do about it?"

My first step is to sign this statement of policy because it is concrete and definite. I agree wholeheartedly, and I know the people of the Nation agree that the foreign policy and the responsibility therefor lies with the Members of this Congress. I concur with point 1 of the declaration. I certainly also agree that we must have an impregnable defense. That, may I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], is one of the grounds for common agreement for which he was seeking. We also agree very strongly that we must have a strong, economic basis for our prosperity. Without an expanding productivity and a sound fiscal policy no defense in the world could stand. We also agree that we must have peace treaties as soon as is compatible with the national interest. I certainly share the strong feeling that we must renew our Western Hemisphere homogeneity by returning to a good-neighbor policy with South and Central America—a policy which we seem to have been neglecting.

Now, on point 5 I faced a slight question: no question of principle, nor of fundamental policy; a difference of expression. Accordingly I signed this statement with two minor deviations. One of them was just minor. Instead of saying "prohibit aid" I would like to say "refuse to offer aid" except to those countries who show the desire to fight for freedom and demonstrate the will to defend themselves. Secondly, I personally would go beyond the inclusive, and, in one sense, exclusive, invitation to Great Britain to participate in the program; I would urge any country who shared our belief and would implement that belief with actual, substantial help to join in this fight against Soviet imperialistic aggression.

That brings me again to the point: What can we do? I think first that we can play fair with the American people and give them as many facts as possible. They want the truth.

We can do one thing more. I am a little frightened that every step taken since I have been here has dealt with militaristic policy or fiscal policy pertaining thereto, or anyway, with some measure that dealt with expanding militarism. I think in our foreign relations we have made one signal error. We have been too busy selling standards of living to the people whom we hope to influence and have not sufficiently expressed to them the underlying spirit and substance of what you and I would both call the American way of life.

I certainly hope that, as we stand, bound ourselves to defend our freedom and urging others to join us, we will remember to sell to everybody that we can, the common people of the world and not the governments, the expanding knowledge of what it actually means to live in full human dignity as free men. That is what I would like to contribute as a last point in this statement of policy. This may seem to be dealing with intangibles, but I would remind you that, after all, our happiness, our prosperity, our greatness, and I believe our safety, depend upon that great intangible of freedom, without which we would not want to live. We must demand and provide moral and spiritual, as well as military mobilization.

I am happy to support this statement of policy. I urge again that we bring as many facts as possible to the truth-hungry American people. Let us tell them over and over again that we, the Congress, whom they send here to represent them, will not abdicate our responsibility.

Further, this may prove to be the most expansive policy in the world, because the conviction grows that without American strength and American freedom—and would it not be terrible if we lost the habit of freedom—there is no hope for our civilization or for us; and neither, I am equally convinced, would there be any hope for a very weary world.

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, the matter before the House has brought forth some wholesome discussion. There is little to be added. To this extent this declaration of principles has accomplished something worth while and justifies its presence here. This open debate helps at least to define an "area of agreement," to use an expression of the majority floor leader.

The preamble contains this statement: "We, the undersigned, conceive that the present position of the United States is dangerous and its future tragic," and something must be done about it.

Few thinking people will disagree with this statement.

We believe our foreign policy should be reexamined and revised. In view of the sorry fact that nobody knows what that policy is now or has been in the immediate past, this statement would seem to be reasonable and accurate.

Paragraph 1 asserts that Congress should participate in and approve our future military and political policy. President Woodrow Wilson authored the phrase "open covenants openly arrived at," and by that he meant that the secret diplomacy of the Old World brings war. We have since seen the tragic results of such diplomacy at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, and today our country is paying the price. We face the prospect of fighting undeclared wars in any place on the globe at the pleasure of the Kremlin, for we have forgotten or failed to heed the words of Abraham Lincoln:

> The provisions of the Constitution giving the war-making power to Congress was dictated, as I understand it, by the following reasons: Kings have always been involving and impoverishing their people in wars, pretending generally, if not always, that the good of the people was the object. This, our convention understood to be the most oppressive of all kingly oppressions, and they resolved to so frame the Constitution that no one man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us.

Lincoln had not heard of "police actions."

We believe this country should be impregnable to attack. Who does not?

We favor economy in Government. This means reduction in nonessential civilian political expenditures. Who, save the administration, disagrees with that.

On this continent was enacted the great drama of all time—man's fight to work out his own salvation in freedom. The main difference between our forefathers and us is that they looked to God for their help, and today the Fair Deal has persuaded so many to look to Government. Our forefathers had faith—faith in themselves, faith in America, faith in God.

We want a strong defense system in the Western Hemisphere. Who finds any fault in that?

Again quoting Abraham Lincoln:

> If danger ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. It cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of free men, we must live through all time, or die by suicide.

Either a loose fiscal policy or a weird foreign policy can mean suicide at this stage of the game.

We want to establish a strong defense line in the Atlantic and Pacific. We would refuse further aid of any kind to Western Europe unless persuaded that Western Europe is carrying its full share of the burden.

In other words, we want to work with but not for freedom-loving nations. The effect of this declaration is this: Western Europe should contribute its part in preparing for its own defense. We have fought two wars in Europe on the theory that in so doing we were defending ourselves and furthering world peace. It is proposed now that we repeat the performance, and we are coy about accepting the invitation.

While this so-called declaration of policy does not cover the picture completely, we offer it as a starting point for producing coherence where now we have nothing but confusion. It gives impetus to discussion.

The reaction among Members of the House during debate was good, for from many quarters it was apparent that there is very little disagreement with the general principles stated by Mr. Hoover in his speeches to the Nation. Almost everyone with whom I have talked, regardless of whether he signed this declaration, indicated that Congress must not surrender further its legislative powers, and the opinion that already we have given to the Executive more power than he is able or should be willing to exercise. Such conduct on the part of the legislative branch has nearly if not quite destroyed its integrity as one of the three branches of this Government. This opinion is subscribed to by Members of Congress, regardless of party affiliations. It was the design of our basic law that treaties, which are nothing but agreements between nations, must be confirmed by the Senate of the United States. Through the practice of entering into agreements with other nations the Executive has, for years, usurped the power of one branch of the Congress and assumes the power to bind us in the future without the advice or the consent of that body, as the Constitution provided.

February 22 will be set aside in the House of Representatives for the purpose of doing honor to the memory of George Washington, the first President of the United States. His Farewell Address will be read with force and quavering emotion. After the ceremonies, this great address, which would save us from catastrophe if it were followed, will be locked up and forgotten until February 22, 1952, when it will be consulted again.

Without standards of behavior we have no morality. Without landmarks, metes and bounds, courses and distances, we have chaos. We want a clear idea where we stand and in what general direction we are heading. If we do not heed history, and know where we have been, we probably will not understand where we are going. The Constitution of the United States was a thoughtful document which recognized the past, profited by its mistakes, and set a course for the future. It established metes and bounds. No straight and narrow path can be followed when fences and sign boards are removed or changed, and the paths are not kept shored.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD immediately following the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAND], and ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, the movement having its real beginning this afternoon is a healthy thing. I take pride in my association with it from its inception, some weeks ago. I am glad to have associated my efforts with those of the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE], as well as my colleagues, Congressmen TOWE, LAWRENCE SMITH, FELLOWS, and O'HARA, efforts which are joined by more than 100 Members of the House. That number will grow.

I think I should also say that we have enjoyed the benefit of the services, suggestions, and enthusiastic encouragement of a considerable number of distinguished Members on the other side of the aisle. It is, of course, entirely evident that a matter of such grave importance transcends any partisan considerations.

The American people and their elected representatives in the Congress are presently engaged in what is being called the great debate.

It is possible that this debate was touched off by the courageous speech made by Joseph P. Kennedy, our former Ambassador to Great Britain, on December 12, 1950. Quoting Lincoln, he said:

> If we could first know where we are and whither we are tending, we could better know what to do and how to do it.

Eight days later, Herbert Hoover opened his thoughtful address on foreign policy by saying:

> No appraisal of the world situation can be final in an unstable world. However, to find our national path, we must constantly reexamine where we have arrived and at times revise our direction.
> I do not propose to traverse the disastrous road by which we have reached this point.

I agree. I conceive that the present position of the United States is dangerous, and its future tragic unless the Congress immediately undertakes a reexamination and revision of a foreign policy that has been and will be a costly failure.

Many of us have been giving close and prayerful consideration to this problem. It is neither possible nor important that we agree on all details. But there are some fundamental issues which I respectfully suggest for your consideration.

First. Whatever our future policy is to be it must be determined with the full participation and approval of the Congress. I fully agree with Senator TAFT, when on January 15 he said:

> The basic liberties of the people of this country are imperiled unless we can retain in Congress the right to pass on policies affecting the very life and being of the American people.

I confess profound shock at the opposing opinion of Senator CONNALLY, who would merely agree to a resolution that would not seek to direct the President in any way, but would give the Senate a sense of participation in the decision without giving it any real or assumed veto power. Presumably the House would not even enjoy this mild satisfaction.

Second. I definitely oppose the broad implications of the Truman doctrine, under the authority of which the United States has assumed the duty to support and defend any free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.

I deny that the United States has either the moral obligation or the practical capacity to carry on any such a global program.

Specifically, I believe we should—

First. Oppose the engagement of our land forces in any part of Asia;

Second. Decline further aid of any kind to Western Europe unless persuaded that Western Europe is carrying its full share of the burden; and Third. Concentrate future policy on the consolidation and defense of the Western Hemisphere.

Obviously this brief statement is subject to amplification and broadening in detail. But I feel the support of these minimum principles is essential to save the country from an attrition of strength which would lead to its ultimate ruin.

I recognize that many patriotic and intelligent people hold quite divergent views, and I fully recognize their right to do so. On the other hand, I demand equal respect for the motives of my position. At the very least these opposing views must be fully debated and resolved, by serious factual analysis, and not by name calling.

Mr. Speaker, you will note that I have specifically suggested my disagreement with the so-called Truman doctrine. This I believe to be the seed of our present difficulties.

There should be no misunderstanding of the Truman doctrine. The President was frank about it. Summed up, it is this—and I quote his words:

> I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.

I believe that we must assist free peoples to work out their own destinies in their own way.

In plain language by the pursuit of such a policy, we have bitten off more than we can chew. I warned of this in a speech I made on May 7, 1947, in connection with the debate on Greek-Turkey loan, I said:

> Four hundred million is appropriated to the President, to start America on a dark journey, a dangerous journey, an imperialistic adventure to every plague spot in the world.

I have no reason now to retract what I said then. In view of the limited time remaining, I shall content myself with a more complete discussion of this dangerous doctrine in the near future.

To conclude, either Congress actively participates in basic policy making decisions, or else we degenerate into a mere Reichstag, having only the very doubtful privilege of voting "Yes," and of providing the funds to implement policies not even submitted to us for our consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRICE). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] is recognized for 5 minutes.

GOVERNMENT BIDDING

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, on October 19, 1950, Mr. J. P. Lawlor, president of the General Filter Co., of Ames, Iowa, went to Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Dayton, Ohio, to find out if there was any contractual work available that could be performed by his company. While there he was given the forms and invited to submit a sealed bid covering 105 mobile demineralizers. On November 13, 1950 on behalf of his company, he did submit a sealed bid, accompanied by a sufficient performance bond, a financial statement, and a letter from a financial institution stating that funds were available to his company to adequately finance the project.

The bids were opened and read at 11 a. m., November 13, 1950. Five companies in all submitted sealed bids. The bid of the General Filter Co., of Ames, Iowa, was $348,591.75. The next lowest bid was by the Refinite Corp., of Omaha, Nebr., $409,842.50. The other three bids were higher than the Omaha corporation. The contract was awarded to the Refinite Corp., of Omaha, Nebr., whose bid was $61,250.75 higher than the bid of the General Filter Co., of Ames, Iowa.

No satisfactory explanation has been given to the General Filter Co., of Ames, Iowa, as to why its bid was rejected. A number of attempted explanations have been offered as a result of protests filed by the General Filter Co., of Ames, and each explanation is different than the previous one, and each one is just about as ridiculous and unfounded as the fact that $61,250.75 of the taxpayers' money was spent unnecessarily on a $350,000 to a $400,000 contract. I have computed the amount of money lost to the taxpayers by rejecting the bid of the General Filter Co., of Ames, and awarding the contract to the Refinite Corp., of Omaha, to be approximately 15 percent. Mr. Speaker, if all the contracts now being let, and to be let, by the Government are to be awarded on this kind of basis, it means that $150,000,000 out of every $1,000,000,000 will be an absolute loss to the taxpayers, or $1,500,000,000 out of every $10,000,000,000, $3,000,000,000 out of every $20,000,000,000, and $15,000,000,000 out of every $100,000,000,000.

Is it any wonder that the people are dissatisfied with the way the Government is handling its business affairs? Is it any wonder they are protesting additional taxes when they know things like this are going on? Just why, Mr. Speaker, when sealed bids are called for and a responsible company submits a bid, supported by a sufficient performance bond and proper financial statements, is such a bid rejected and it awarded another company whose bid is 15 percent higher? Is this favoritism, or is it just plain stupidity?

I do not expect anything I say here to change the present contract—nor do the officers of the General Filter Co. of Ames, Iowa, expect it to be changed now—but they, as well as every other taxpayer, would like to be assured that such unwarranted waste of the taxpayers' money will not be permitted in the future. Is this the reason why the President was reported recently in the press as having told a committee of Congress that there could be no reduction in the present budget and that he dared the Congress to cut it?

Mr. Speaker, I am fully conscious of the limitation of the powers of Congress; namely, that it is only a legislative body with power to investigate, but no power to enforce any of its own laws. However, Mr. Speaker, under the present emergency, would it not be possible to have a committee of Congress set up with power to compel governmental agencies to reduce waste and cut out foolish expenditures such as the one I have just cited? Surely, through its control of the purse it could force a great reduction of unwarranted waste.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman a few questions about this. Is the company in Ames, Iowa, a large company or is it a small company?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. It is a small company. It is a very good company. It was formed in 1935, and it has been doing a handsome business. It has made money. It has submitted its plans and specifications to the Air Force Department at Patterson Field and was told it was capable of doing the job.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

THE INDIAN SERVICE HOSPITAL AT BETHEL, ALASKA

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, last November a disastrous fire swept through the United States Indian Service Hospital at Bethel, Alaska, destroying the main building and the Quonset-type annex. Fortunately all of the nearly 60 patients were removed to safety—and all within a very short period of time.

This hospital at Bethel served an area of between sixty to seventy thousand square miles and the town does not have highway or railroad facilities. Furthermore the river and bay into the Bering Sea are open only about 4 months of the year. Although the population of Bethel is only about 650, the Indian Service estimates that the area served by the hospital involves about 9,000 people.

I am reliably informed that the Federal Government is now paying about $140 minimum round-trip airplane fare to fly these emergency cases out of Bethel to other nearest Government hospitals. It is 770 airline miles to the Government hospital at Barrow and 1,140 airline miles to the hospital at Juneau. I am advised that in some of these instances the condition of the patient is such that it is necessary to send along a nurse or an attendant, thus doubling the fare.

When we figure that in the last fiscal year this hospital had 212 major surgical cases alone, we can realize the great expense involved in flying these cases to other hospitals and the urgent need to move at the earliest possible moment to begin rebuilding this institution which has served the Bethel area so well since it was built in 1939. In the hope that no time will be lost through unnecessary delays and to avoid waiting for the regular Interior Department appropriation bill, I have today introduced a bill designed to start this project on its way.

Personally I am a strong advocate of private enterprise and an opponent of Government carrying on a business at taxpayers' expense that could normally be carried on by private institutions.

In the case of the Bethel Hospital, private hospital facilities are just not available in the area. Our only alternative is to rebuild this structure destroyed by fire just as rapidly as possible.

We are today appropriating vast sums of money for do-good projects throughout the world—all to advertise democracy and in the hope we will stave off the advance of communism.

Here we have an opportunity to practice what we preach. Russians are attacking our policies with respect to our Territories and insular possessions. Here is an opportunity to show the world just how rapidly we can move in looking after the welfare of our own.

Since 1885 missionaries of the Moravian Church have been carrying on their work in this Kuskokwim River area served by the Bethel Hospital. Through their mission activities they have worked closely with the hospital authorities. These missionaries are now working among the church's 2,500 native members in 25 communities along Kuskokwim River and the Kuskokwim Bay.

Many of you will recall the work carried on among the American Indians in Ohio by the missionaries of the Moravian Church. One of these—David Zeisberger—is credited with saving the colonists from the attacks of the Iroquois Indians at a critical point during the Revolutionary War.

The missionaries of this church are well established in the Kuskokwim River area and are thoroughly familiar with the needs of the people there. Their board of elders has communicated with me, fearing that this hospital might not be rebuilt or that steps toward its rebuilding might be extended indefinitely.

The Indian Service informs me that it has filed with the Budget Bureau a request and accompanying papers justifying the rebuilding of this hospital. I am advised that it is the opinion of the Indian Service that the need for this hospital is great and that there are sufficient Alaska natives living in that area whose health problems are of such magnitude that they require a hospital in or near Bethel. I hope the Bureau of the Budget will realize the emergency in this situation and expedite this project.

During the fiscal year of 1950 this hospital had 450 admissions and in addition treated 3,792 persons who were not admitted to the institution as bed patients. This averages better than 1 new admission—1 new bed patient—every day and more than 10 persons given medical treatment and permitted to leave the institution every day.

In the months of June and July prior to the fire, the number of bed patients averaged 72 a day. The hospital was rated as a 60-bed hospital. Thus you observe the Bethel Hospital was already overtaxed. The Indian Service has asked the Bureau of the Budget for approval of a 70-bed hospital. It is felt this will handle the needs, since the tuberculosis patients treated at the Bethel Hospital at the time of the fire will soon receive treatment at a new tuberculosis hospital elsewhere in Alaska.

Mr. Speaker, while we spend much time considering the needs of those associated with us in the struggle for a free world, I hope we will also move expeditiously in meeting this urgent need in one of our own Territories.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, we have listened for about 90 minutes to speeches in connection with the foreign affairs of our country. While they have all been very interesting, the sum total of the remarks impressed itself upon my mind as that my friends are possessed of a "defeatist" attitude. They are not possessed of that affirmative spirit which brings with it the confidence needed in the conflict or danger that may confront our country. The impression left in my mind was that they were advocating, without saying it in words, the spirit of retreat, criticizing, griping remarks containing nothing affirmative. Some even had differences of opinion with each other, no two agreeing.

I would like to search for the "area of agreement." To me this is very important, not the "area of disagreement." I think the "area of disagreement" has been stressed too much. What is the "area of agreement"? What are the things that the Members of Congress are agreed upon? When we find that we shall have found an area of basic agreement although we may differ as to methods, in which case there is an area of basic agreement. And then to find out in some sources what the "area of disagreement" is, the fatal tactics used to try and portray to the American public the feeling that there is confusion, confusion, confusion.

I can remember 10 years ago some of those who spoke today making the same type of speeches when we were trying to prepare ourselves against an attack by Hitler. I can remember the one-vote victory on extending the Selective Service Act. I have often wondered, Mr. Speaker, what a terrible price the conscience of every Member would have exacted who voted against the extension of selective service about 2 months before Pearl Harbor had the bill been defeated by one or two or more votes. The responsibility of one who loses is an easy thing to satisfy himself about; you can conjure up this and that and justify it; but I have often wondered, had the extension of selective service been defeated in September of 1941 instead of going through by one vote, what would have been the thoughts in the minds and consciences of those Members on that famous roll call who voted against it. I would not want to have it on my conscience if as a result of that vote my country lost its independence and our people their freedom, or if that vote contributed to the loss of independence and freedom, or if that vote contributed toward serious impairment of the best interests of the United States.

We had a civil war, and we had a great President, the first Republican President who was our leader in that tragic era. If he were alive today he would be a Democrat; he could not stand for what is going on and for the thoughts running through the minds of many I listen to on the left side of the aisle today, not only in reference to domestic affairs but in foreign affairs as well. He did not have the support of his own party in Congress when he was President; he was held in contempt; he was hated by Members of Congress, both in the House and the Senate. Much of that was due to political reasons. The sad thing today is to see, not in this body I am glad to say, expressing my opinion, but elsewhere, some men with presidential ambitions who have jealousy toward such a great American as General Eisenhower because they fear he might be nominated by the Republican convention as a candidate for President in 1952.

We had men who hated Wilson only 30 years ago, and they stopped the League of Nations from becoming an effective instrument for peace. We have the same minds—different names—today. The feeling of jealousy and hatred is generating. I am glad to say that is not so in this body so far as I can observe, but it is generating just the same.

Reference has been made to certain polls. It is perfectly all right to consider polls as a piece of evidence, but when I see or hear Member after Member get up and talk about polls, conveying the information they should vote in accordance with those polls, I ask, "What is their responsibility under representative government?"

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FURCOLO. I do not know how many Members saw it, but back 3 or 4 weeks ago either Look or Life magazine had a picture story. Apparently some months ago at the time of Korea they sent their representatives into a town in Ohio and took a cross-section and printed the pictures and the stories of many people there. There was practically unanimity of opinion so far as those people were concerned in support of what was being done in Korea. About 3 weeks ago or around that time they went back to the very same people and asked them what they thought then. Those people for the most part had completely changed.

Now, that implies, to my mind at least, a responsibility not only upon the Representatives in this Congress to act upon their own initiative but also to have some information as to the basis upon which the people of this country are expressing opinions, because certainly we cannot have our policy shift back and forth as easily and as often as has been done by that illustration.

I may say to one of the Members who spoke recently, in which he mentioned a speech made by former Ambassador Kennedy, and I have no desire to comment upon that speech made by the father of one of our distinguished colleagues, I think if that Member is to use former Ambassador Kennedy's speech as an indication of what should or should not be done, perhaps he should also include in his remarks the stand former Ambassador Kennedy took in England when it was a question of whether England was going to try to resist Hitler.

Mr. McCORMACK. I appreciate the gentleman's observation.

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. FELLOWS. The gentleman appropriately spoke about the hatred that people have for men who have reached the peak in political and other life. That was significant, as the gentleman stated, with reference to the great President Wilson, who was an American, a top American, a constitutional American, it also reached the peak with reference to President Roosevelt and President Truman; but it never in the history of this country reached as high a place as it did against President Hoover when he was President and ran the second time.

Mr. McCORMACK. What is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. FELLOWS. To the gentleman's speech about hatred and jealousy.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman admit that when Lincoln was President he did not have a friend among his own party in the Congress?

Mr. FELLOWS. No. His Vice President came from my district. Certainly not.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the Vice President a Member of Congress?

Mr. FELLOWS. No.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Massachusetts referred to Members of Congress. The Vice President presides over the Senate. He is not a Member of the Senate. Is my recollection of the Constitution correct that the Vice President is not a Member of the Senate?

Mr. FELLOWS. Well, of course, nobody ever received the abuse that Herbert Hoover received.

Mr. McCORMACK. From Republicans, too.

Mr. FELLOWS. From the gentleman's party.

Mr. McCORMACK. Let me say to the gentleman that I can remember in 1933 or 1934 when a couple of Republican Members of the House bitterly and personally attacked former President Hoover. I was on the floor. The gentleman smiles because he probably has a recollection of that too. I waited to see if some Republican Member of the House would speak for the former President. Nobody did. And I rose and defended him as an American. He was my President when he was in office. I might disagree with him, but he was the President of the United States and while he was President he was my President and carried my respect as President and my respect for the office of President.

I can remember when Harold Stassen resigned as Governor of Minnesota to go into the Navy in World War II. When he made the statement about international affairs three or four Republicans got up, friends who did not agree with him—and they had a perfect right to disagree—but they bitterly attacked Harold Stassen. I only met the gentleman once. To my recollection I have not met him since. But I admired him as an American and as an individual. I waited to hear if any Republican was going to say a word for Harold Stassen. Nobody did, so I got up and defended him as an American. I simply refer to that to show that we Democrats do not hate. We may disagree but we do not hate. That is the prerogative of some other people; I am not saying it is the prerogative of the Republican Party, but it certainly is not within the realm of the Democratic Party or any Member to hate. We can disagree sharply and intensely, but we never hate.

Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to make an observation?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes. I would like to ask the gentleman how he characterizes the statement of the present President with reference to the marines.

Mr. McCORMACK. The present President is a man who, like the gentleman from Michigan, is a type. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], is a very rare type, and at least I interpret the gentleman's state of mind in accordance with the type he is. The type he is is due to heredity; he inherited certain characteristics.

He cannot get away any more than all of us can get away from certain characteristics. That was said in the same sense as the gentleman from Michigan says a lot of things. He does not intend them.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am finding the gentleman not guilty.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Wait a minute.

Mr. McCORMACK. I insist upon it. He cannot plead guilty in my court. He can plead guilty to political differences but he cannot plead guilty to anything on the personal level. You can use it if you want to; I prefer you would.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In the campaign?

Mr. McCORMACK. I have a very high regard for the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not intend to go this far. I want to make a few observations now.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman made reference to me. Will he yield for an answer?

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot resist the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Please do not charge me with not at least thinking that I know what I am talking about.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a question of fact.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I did not want to interrupt the gentleman's essay on types, but I want to register the fact that I am in complete agreement with his colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PURCOLO] in which he said he felt it was incumbent upon the Members of this body to make decisions for themselves upon information furnished, and I wish to say that I am very much in favor of that, and I hope it implies that we will in this House receive more information and more prompt information, especially upon international matters, than we have been receiving lately. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts, the distinguished majority leader, will concur in that hope.

Mr. McCORMACK. There is nothing about what the gentleman says but what anybody would concur in. I might say that President Truman has been consulting all the time with the appropriate committees in both branches of the Congress. Nobody expects the President to consult with each and every one of us, but there have been constant consultations. I have attended a number of meetings because of my being leader; others I have not, because they were confined to the Armed Services or the Committee on Foreign Affairs or the Committee on Foreign Relations. But I can assure the gentleman and the people of America that there has been constant consultation. All Members may not agree but as far as consultation is concerned, that relationship has existed. I agree with the gentleman from California, it should continue to exist.

I think the debate today has done a lot of good. What I am searching for is the "area of agreement," not the "area of disagreement." I place a different interpretation upon Mr. Hoover's speech than some others do. I think there is an "area of agreement" there. There is also an "area of disagreement." Why do we not play up the "area of agreement" instead of playing up the "area of disagreement" and thus creating the impression that there is complete disagreement? I think if we went ahead constructively and talked about the "area of agreement" that exists, and played that up, and then through discussion saw whether we could extend that more and more, that would be more conducive to the best interests of our country than to play up the disagreements and create an impression that there is constant disagreement between Members of Congress and prominent Americans, Presidents, past Presidents, or otherwise, when as a matter of fact there is a wide "area of agreement."

The spirit of what has been agreed, the statement mentioned in today's debate, to and signed is the thing that disturbs me, the impression that goes out that we want to leave Europe to itself. I think it is for the national interest of my country to have friends in the world, to have other countries as friends. I think it is to the national interest of my country to try to help other peoples resist aggression. Aggression today is more than international communism when in control of a government, it carries with it all of the harmful results that flow therefrom—imprisonment, death, vicious persecution, the destruction of the dignity of the individual.

As far as we are concerned, we can have peace very easily if we want to get down on our knees and beg and crawl. Sure, you can have peace that way, but what red-blooded American wants to do that? No real red-blooded American will do it. So let us try to explore more and more the "area of agreement" rather than stress the "areas of disagreement."

Mr. TOWE. If the gentleman will yield, may I point out that the declaration does not say nor does it suggest that those who signed it want to leave Europe to their own resources? It does not say that, and that is an improper interpretation, if the gentleman will read it.

Mr. McCORMACK. I said the spirit of the resolution. Those who have spoken today do not all agree. I should like to do something where there is an "area of agreement," and then let us try to extend it as time goes on, not stressing the "area of disagreement."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman spoke about the "area of agreement," that we should stress that.

Mr. McCORMACK. What is the "area of agreement" to which the gentleman would go?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Was I asking the gentleman a question or was he asking me one? First, I was asking the gentleman a question, which was, having stressed the necessity of an "area of agreement," can the gentleman name one Democrat who has agreed in anything with the speech made by Mr. Hoover, and if so, what was it, and who said it?

Mr. McCORMACK. One Democrat who agrees with what?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. With any one thing that Mr. Hoover proposed in this last speech, and if some Democrat did agree, when was it, and what did he say?

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not agree with that statement. I made the statement just now that there is a wide "area of agreement" there, so the gentleman's hearing must be very bad, because only a few moments ago I made that statement.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What does the gentleman agree with that Hoover said? What did Hoover say in his last speech that the gentleman agrees with?

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with what is contained in this statement here that we should develop the strength of America, and I have always advocated that, but use it affirmatively and effectively for good, for a future decent world, and to stop international communism from taking over country after country. I agree on the development of the strength of America. Others disagree with me on how the strength of America should be exercised.

In any event, if we want peace, as I said, we can have it very easily by being kneeling cowards. On the other hand, if we are still Americans, as we are supposed to be, thinking rationally and soundly and with stout heart, there is no need for any one of us or any American to lack confidence as to the future in meeting the problems which may confront us. Let us have more affirmative speeches, rather than the nagging, distorted speeches which discolor the truth. As a matter of fact, the leadership of President Truman has been absolutely sound in opposition to international communism.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the expiration of the special orders already granted, and any which may hereafter be entered today, I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to be first in this session of Congress to direct the attention of this body to unfinished legislative business of the most vital importance to the national welfare. On January 3, I introduced H. R. 545, a bill to authorize the appropriation of funds to assist the States and Territories in financing a minimum foundation program of education in the public elementary and secondary schools.

This bill seeks no objective not recognized in several recent sessions of both the House and the Senate. A measure of this kind was adopted in the Senate of the Eightieth Congress by an overwhelming vote of 58 to 22. Practically the same legislation passed the Senate of the Eighty-first Congress by the still more decisive vote of 58 to 15.

In recognition of the urgent need which this legislation was drawn to meet, this House was not idle. Numerous Members of this body introduced in both the Eightieth and the Eighty-first Congresses bills providing for Federal aid to education. Almost certain passage was indicated by the strong support given to such legislation by Members who did not themselves join in introducing the measure. Unfortunately, the measure was never placed before this body for a vote. Its endorsement in the House Committee on Education and Labor was obstructed by continued controversy over matters that were little related to the welfare of children or to the national crisis toward the solution of which the measure was intended to serve. In the introduction of H. R. 545, I have attempted to avoid the controversies which previously blocked consideration of this measure, as I shall shortly make clear.

FEDERAL AID A BIPARTISAN ISSUE

I wish to call your attention to the fact that Federal aid to education is a bipartisan issue, as it should be. It would be a great tragedy in this Nation if one of the great political parties should aline itself against essential provisions for our schools, the institutions upon which popular government so largely depends.

Three times during the sessions of the Eighty-first Congress the President of the United States unequivocally endorsed Federal aid to education in official statements presented to the Congress, and upon more than one occasion he advocated the early adoption of Federal-aid legislation in his public addresses and interviews with the press.

Nevertheless, the Federal-aid measure so decisively approved by the Senate in the last Congress was introduced by a group of Senators representing equally both major parties; and support for the bill in debate on the floor of the Senate came from the leaders of both parties. The Federal-aid-to-education bills introduced in the House of Representatives during the Eighty-first Congress were offered by representatives of both the Republican and the Democratic Parties. Fortunately, therefore, concern for the welfare of our schools and the adequacy of their services to American children and youth cuts across political boundary lines.

THE PRESIDENT ENDORSES FEDERAL AID

I do not need to remind you that the President of the United States, in his state of the Union message on January 8, reiterated his request for Federal-aid legislation in the following words:

> From the standpoint of national security alone, as well as the enlargement of opportunities for the individual, the Nation needs to see that every youth acquires the fundamental education and training which are essential to effective service, whether in the Armed Forces, in industry, or on the farm. I, therefore, urge the Congress to authorize Federal financial assistance to help the States provide a level of elementary and secondary education that will meet the minimum needs of the Nation.

In his economic report to the Congress, the President said:

> As we move into a period when we will have an urgent need for all our trained men and women, we must face the fact that nothing can make up for faulty basic education in our primary and secondary schools. This is as true for the men in military service as for the factory worker or the farm hand.
> Our public-school system faces the greatest crisis in its history. More than ever before, we need positive action by the Federal Government to help the States meet their educational tasks. We simply cannot afford to let overcrowding or lack of equipment or staff impair the basic education of our young people.

In keeping with such recommendations often repeated by the President, I introduced H. R. 545. In behalf of the principle it advocates and the action for which it provides, I now address you.

A YEAR OF DECISIONS

This is a year of fateful decisions. Upon the nature of these decisions the very existence of the human freedoms, indeed, the continued existence of the United States as a free and independent nation may rest. I do not believe I have a single colleague in this body who does not recognize this fact.

I submit to you that there is no more important decision this body has to make than the one upon which I address you—a decision vitally affecting those human resources upon which both our military defense and our prosperity depend.

Those countries supporting ideologies threatening the existence of our own embrace in their populations nearly one-half the peoples of the earth. Already the majority of these peoples are heavily armed.

It should be clear to anyone who gives this matter a single thought that those who must protect themselves against such odds cannot afford to neglect the fullest development of the human resources which they have at hand. It would be suicidal to do so.

We are mobilizing our industrial resources. We are lengthening our assembly lines. We are stockpiling critical supplies. Our scientists and inventors are feverishly at work on more powerful and more deadly weapons of war. Sixty-nine percent of the budget recommended by the President is to defray the cost of national defense. Appropriations already made and which must yet be made for national defense total to a figure staggering the finite mind. Threatened by potential foes that can array against us six army divisions to our one, shall we not give thought to creating that superiority of personnel which is our only hope of victory?

We should need no proof of the advantage held by superior numbers in battle. But if we wish that proof we may have it by reading in any newspaper any day that overwhelming hordes of the enemy are slowly but surely pressing the fighting men of the United Nations back to the beachheads of peril.

WAR AND EDUCATION

Experience should have taught us by now the cost of educational deficiencies in war. The lack of adequate education on the part of many thousands of men in World War I so hampered military effort that campaigns to reduce illiteracy in the United States were among the most marked domestic results of the war.

Data from the National Selective Service System in World War II show that 659,000 men were rejected for educational deficiencies alone. These men were physically fit. They qualified otherwise. Essentially they could not read and write well enough to participate effectively in a way that was so largely technical and scientific in character. These 659,000 men would have composed more than 40 divisions—counting 15,000 men to the division—more combat divisions than were committed to the South Pacific theater of the war. Forty divisions were lost because someone failed to see that the men who might have composed them acquired the simplest rudiments of education.

During World War II, and for the 5 years since hostility ceased, Congress has been urged time and time again to provide the necessary financial assistance for the equalization of educational opportunity. When hostilities in Korea began, youth again were submitted to the objective accounting imposed by war. The National Selective Service System found it necessary to turn down 6 men out of 10 for physical and educational reasons. How much longer are we going to take sides with our enemies? How much longer are we going to sabotage the national defense by failure to strengthen our human resources?

THE HUMAN STOCKPILE

The men who carry the guns, drive the tanks, fly the planes, man our ships, are our most important stockpile. It may be taken for granted by some people that this resource can be picked up at will without foresight, without effort, without expense whenever, wherever it is needed. This attitude is so unrealistic as to be untenable. Education is a long process, a process associated with mental, and physical growth. It can be hurried very little. By Herculean effort we may very quickly transform our peacetime factories into war plants. We may quickly restrict the use of raw materials to the urgent needs of defense. We cannot make such a transformation in the development of the young people upon whom we must depend for the services of defense. There is no whip with which learning can be speeded. It takes time. We must prepare now for the years ahead.

Recently Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower said:

> To neglect our school system would be a crime against the future. Such neglect could well be more disastrous to all our freedoms than the most formidable armed assault on our physical defenses. * * * Where our schools are concerned, no external threat can excuse negligence; no menace can justify a bolt to progress.

TENSIONS WILL PERSIST

No one who predicts total war expects it to be brief in time nor confined in scope, although we all hope it can be avoided. In his state of the Union message the President advised the American people to get ready for the long pull. Secretary of Defense General Marshall in his testimony before the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate predicted that—

> Tensions that unsettle the world may persist through the lifetime of many of us. We must husband our military and industrial manpower with utmost care; we must foster our scientific and technical resources; we must avoid waste in the productive energies that help make our Nation powerful.

Significantly the Secretary of Defense referred to "our scientific and technical resources"; the President of the United States, referring to the "long pull" called for effort "to increase our capacity to produce and to keep our economy strong." The extension of full educational opportunity to all young Americans, whatever its cost, will not be wasted if we are never called upon to fight a total war. Upon effective preparation of youth depends our scientific and technical progress and our future economy in peace. The stockpiles of bombs and guided missiles would become obsolete with peace, but the reserve of fully developed human resources is the best possible guarantee of prosperity for a peaceful future.

At present we are far short of preparing our human resources either for contributions to victory in war or for contributions to economic prosperity in peace. At the time of the most recent count there were in the United States 2,838,000 persons 14 years old and over who could neither read nor write. About three times as many had less than a fifth-grade education. Approximately 4,000,000 school-age children were not enrolled in any school.

SUBSTANDARD SCHOOLS FOR MORE CHILDREN

Substandard educational opportunity is certain to be provided for more children in this generation than in the last, unless some definite positive action is taken to prevent it. There has been a tremendous increase in the birthrate which is already felt in greatly expanded school enrollments. A stork that in 1933 brought less than 17 babies for every 1,000 of the population suddenly showed up in 1947 with 27 babies per 1,000. The rate of arrival of the new-born first jumped significantly in 1942. These youngsters are already in the elementary schools. Their brothers and sisters who have come on apace since 1942 will, in due time, be knocking at the schoolhouse door for admission. The increasing birthrate is more persistent than was anticipated by the Bureau of the Census, but a careful study by the Bureau indicates that a school enrollment which had reached less than 27,000,000 in the school years 1940–50 will jump past 34,000,000 at the end of this decade. There are not enough teachers now to take care of the increased school population. We are making anything but an auspicious beginning in turning out the 750,000 new teachers which, by the most conservative estimate, will be needed from 1950 to 1960. At the present rate of preparation in our teacher education institutions we can expect not much more than one-third of the needed number of qualified teachers.

There are in the American schools 90,000 teachers who hold substandard certificates—a number forty-five times that of prewar days. In 17 States more than one-half of the teachers have less than 4 years of college preparation.

SHORTAGE OF TEACHERS

The most important reason for the shortage of qualified teachers is economic. While the average salary of teachers in the United States is about $3,000 a year, in at least 10 States last year teachers received an approximate salary of less than $2,000; in two States an average salary of less than $1,600.

There is no reason to believe that parents in some States are less solicitous for the welfare of their children than in others.

UNEVEN DISTRIBUTION OF CHILDREN AND WEALTH

The inequality of educational opportunity in the United States is due to factors inherent in our national ideal of a free economy. It is a result of the uneven distribution of taxable wealth and of children among the States. A survey recently made shows that some communities of the Nation spent sixty times as much per year to maintain a school classroom as other communities expended. As a rule, States with more children and less wealth than other States make greater effort to provide good schools, and in spite of that effort meet with less success. There is no means of equalizing educational opportunity in this Nation except through the accepted principle of taxation. Taxes are raised where the wealth is located and expended for the needs of the Nation wherever they exist.

PROVISIONS OF H. R. 545

The legislative proposal which I have introduced for your consideration would help tremendously in eliminating the inequalities of educational opportunity in the United States. It would provide for a minimum foundation program for our public elementary and secondary schools. It calls for an annual appropriation of $300,000,000 distributed among the States on a purely objective formula. Ninety-seven percent of the funds would be allocated to the States directly in proportion to the number of children of school age and inversely proportional to the wealth of the States. The measure provides that Federal funds cannot be substituted for State and local funds. If States and communities decrease their support Federal funds are proportionately reduced. Provisions are made for aid to the Territories as well as the States. The rights of minority races are respected. The bill provides that a State educational authority dissatisfied with the administration of the act may appeal to an appropriate court. The measure offers no loophole of any kind through which State and local control of the educational program may be removed or abridged. In this respect it recognizes the tradition of the Nation from its founding and is consistent with nearly one and three-quarters centuries of practice in granting Federal aid to education which has not resulted in Federal control of our educational institutions.

AVOIDING CONTROVERSY

Of special importance is the fact that this bill is drawn to avoid obstructing controversy. Previous considerations of the Federal-aid measures in the House Committee on Education and Labor have become entangled in disagreements over whether private schools should become beneficiaries of the act. There has been little insistence that Federal funds should be expended for the purposes of paying teachers' salaries in private schools or of maintaining and operating private school plants. Those who demanded that Federal funds be made available to private schools have asked that such funds be allocated solely for the purpose of paying for transportation of pupils, for health services, for textbooks, or for other auxiliary services. This bill provides that the moneys distributed shall be expended only for the payment of public school teachers' salaries and for the maintenance and operation of public-school plants. Any provisions for the allocation of funds to public and private schools for auxiliary services would be taken up in a separate measure and the issue decided there without imperiling our schools and our Nation in this crisis.

THE PEOPLE DEMAND FEDERAL AID

The proposal for Federal aid to education is made pursuant to wide demands on the part of those who are interested in the welfare of children and the future of our country. The American Legion at its annual convention last October again called upon Congress to enact at the earliest possible moment legislation which will provide Federal aid to education without Federal control and with full preservation of the accepted American principle of the local management of schools.

The Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth recently held in Washington, attended by nearly 6,000 citizens charged with responsibilities for the education and care of youth advocated that "Federal aid be provided to the States for educational services in tax-supported public schools without Federal control to help equalize educational opportunity; the issue of auxiliary services to be considered on its merits in separate legislation."

The National Congress of Parents and Teachers has adopted a resolution in favor of Federal aid to schools:

> We support legislation that would provide grants in aid for publicly controlled, tax-supported schools; allocations to States on the basis of relative per capita income and school-age population; and provisions for a minimum foundation program to serve as a guide for equalizing educational services within the State.

Among the many other organizations endorsing the principle of Federal aid to education are, the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The most recent call for support to schools has come from the President of the United States in the annual report of the budget submitted Monday, January 15. The document includes the following statement:

> Promotion of education: Strong elementary and secondary educational systems throughout the country are vital to national strength and to the improvement of individual opportunity. Although educational opportunities are excellent in some parts of the country, children and youth in too many of our communities still do not receive adequate education. Inequalities exist primarily because of differences in the financial resources of the States and localities.
> The Nation as a whole suffers from these inequalities. The results are demonstrated most sharply in times like the present. The military services even find it necessary to teach some inductees reading and writing before they can begin combat training. From the standpoint of national security alone, as well as the enlargement of opportunities for the individual, the Nation needs to see that every youth acquires the fundamental education and training which are essential to effective service, whether in the Armed Forces, in industry, or on the farm. I therefore urge the Congress to authorize Federal financial assistance to help the States provide a level of elementary and secondary education that will meet the minimum needs of the Nation. The budget includes a tentative appropriation estimate of $300,000,000 for this purpose.

In the opinion of the lay citizen, in the opinion of the elected officials of this country there must be no moratorium on basic essentials. We cannot longer countenance a Federal policy of neglect of those institutions upon which the survival of our freedoms depends.

FEDERAL AID NOT NEW

The principle of Federal aid to education which I advocate is not an innovation. It is consistent with the American pattern of support for all Federal enterprises. Our revenues of all kinds and for all purposes are collected where wealth is and expended to meet the need wherever it may exist. Revenues collected in part from New England may help widen the channel of the Mississippi or build a postoffice in Alabama. Federal revenue collected in part from Florida may help eradicate the sheep tick in Montana or build a dam in Colorado. I ask only that the Federal Government be as concerned about the welfare of its children, the development of its human resources as it is concerned about the highways which bind our States together, the maintenance of our navigable waterways, the eradication of insect pests, protection from flood, and the irrigation of our deserts.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at this time. I will yield later.

I know that we must practice economy, but this is a measure on which we cannot afford to practice false economy, in view of the record. We know from the other war—and the same thing is happening today—that the disparities in education are growing greater instead of less.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at this time. I will yield later.

This legislation is of great importance and I feel sure that the Committee on Education and Labor will give this subject the most careful consideration.

I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he thinks the Congress really grasps the serious situation confronting our public schools? Speaking, for instance, of the matter of school facilities, let me remind you that during the depression days there were periods in which we woefully neglected our school facilities, and before we were really out of the depression the Second World War came on; there was a freeze order on essential building materials; nothing was done during that period, and by the time we were beginning to get organized after the end of World War II we found ourselves in another period in which it is almost impossible. We are 20 to 25 years behind in our public school system today, particularly in the matter of school facilities. The situation is all too serious in regard to the teaching personnel, but I must say that this Congress in its effort to conserve and to throw everything possible into the education effort it must not forget the school system of our country. There is too much at stake. What good is it to talk about technical warfare if we neglect the education of the children to the extent that they could not even operate the technical implements themselves?

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the Congress realizes that there are over 1,000,000 boys and girls attending school in this country today on a half-day basis. I just wonder how much longer the American people can tolerate that situation affecting their public schools and expect to turn out the kind of citizens we need to carry on in a world as unsettled as it is at the present time. Do you really think the Congress has any grasp of the seriousness of the situation? Does the gentleman think they are informed of the needs of our schools?

Mr. PERKINS. First, I wish to thank the gentleman from West Virginia for his contribution.

I do not think that the Congress of the United States has given this important problem the consideration it merits; in fact, I believe we have been treating this question too lightly and that we must do something if we are to give the boys and girls in the public elementary and secondary schools the type of education they deserve. Why do I say this? Because the National Government owes something to the citizens of the United States. The record shows that the States with the least income, particularly the Southern States and some others, are spending a greater proportion of their income for education than are the richer States. Let us take for example the State of Alabama. Alabama spends 2.50 percent of her total income, the income of everybody added together, for her public schools, and stands eighth in the 48 States in her effort to educate her children. New York spends 1.56 percent of her total income for education, and rates forty-second in effort; yet Alabama's effort yields only $87 per child, whereas New York's effort of 1.56 percent yields approximately $225 per child.

Let us look at it in another way: For instance, South Carolina and Mississippi have some 280 children per thousand population; California, Connecticut, and New Jersey have only 170 children per thousand. This disparity exists to such a degree that in my judgment the Congress of the United States should pass legislation that would guarantee a minimum foundation program as provided in this bill, the expenditure of not less than $55 for every boy and girl in the elementary and secondary schools of this Nation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It is regrettable to learn from the gentleman from West Virginia—and I assume he is speaking about the schools in his own community—that they are in such a deplorable condition. In our communities in the North we have schools, and I know of no one at least in southwestern Michigan who does not have an opportunity to obtain an education if he so desires.

I was somewhat amazed to hear the gentleman who now has the floor tell us that the Federal Government owes its citizens something. I had always supposed that the citizens owed the Federal Government something. I do not know how the Federal Government can pay anyone anything because it has no source of income, as we all know, except that which it takes from the people, and every time the Federal Government, or for that matter any other government, takes a dollar from the taxpayers it always does what we call shave that dollar before it lets it go back home. So it is a losing transaction for any community to accept anything from the Federal Government except, perhaps, protection, which every government ought to give to all its citizens.

Mr. PERKINS. In response to the gentleman from Michigan, may I say that I believe the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides equal protection under the law.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Sure, and with that I agree.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Michigan must bear in mind that much of the per capita wealth that he has in his State and the total income, that is income of everyone in the State of Michigan, added together was not all created in the State of Michigan. Some of that wealth was created in the State of Kentucky and in my State escaped taxation, or materially anyway, and appears in the income of people in the State of Michigan. Therefore it is reasonable and it is the thing for the Government to do to tax money where it is and distribute the revenues where they are needed.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am constrained to make a preliminary statement for the gentleman's benefit. He referred to the birth rate of California as about 140 per thousand. I was going to suggest if the Eastern and Southern States would send out their younger citizens instead of their aged citizens to get on our old-age pension rolls, we would probably be able to raise that birth rate to something that would better please the gentleman from Kentucky.

But my question is this, and it is a very serious one because the gentleman has referred to the seriousness of the wider need for education. The Federal Government is $257,000,000,000 in debt. Will the gentleman tell me what the surplus is in the treasury of Kentucky and perhaps what the surplus in the treasury of West Virginia is? I may say that I send over to the Library of Congress about once a year and I get a list of the surpluses and credit balances in the States. They are all plus, but the Federal Government is $257,000,000,000 in debt. It seems to me if education is as important as the gentleman from Kentucky thinks, as I think, as the gentleman from Michigan thinks and as undoubtedly the gentleman from West Virginia believes, is it not the No. 1 item in the States to take care of their own children in the matter of education?

Mr. PERKINS. Let me answer the gentleman from California in this way: I stated that the school-age children per thousand of population in California was 170 as compared with 280 per thousand in some of the Southern States. If the gentleman from California wishes to disclaim the people that migrated to California over a period of years because of certain defense work and other reasons, I certainly think he has made a strong argument for Federal aid to education.

I believe the record will disclose that approximately 60 percent of the people that are born in one State sooner or later migrate to another State. But the point that we should consider is solely this: Whether or not a State that is making a greater effort by spending more of its total income than some other State for education should equalize that burden; and I contend that it is the duty and the responsibility of the Federal Government more nearly to equalize that burden.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to reply to the gentleman from California and advise him that he does not need to worry about the paucity of children in the State of California. I happened to be chairman of the subcommittee on education that conducted a survey of the schools in the interim between the sessions of the Eighty-first Congress, and I would like to advise the gentleman that in his nearby city of Los Angeles testimony given to my committee showed that there were 50,400 boys and girls between the first grade and junior high school in Los Angeles County alone on a half-day session of school. I would also like to tell the gentleman that 63 percent of the buildings in Los Angeles are just mere shacks; only 37 percent are permanent buildings. He does not need to worry. I do not know of any other State in the Nation that needs some kind of aid from some source for their school system any more than the State of California.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, there is a misunderstanding. We are not particularly worried. We appreciate the concern of the gentleman from West Virginia in this and many other matters, but he need not worry about assistance which is not solicited by California. It seems to me that it should be put on the record that California is building its own school buildings. In the last bill discussed in committee, California was not asking for aid, and I think the gentleman is giving a wrong impression. We do appreciate the gentleman's concern over California, and I trust he has the same concern over his own State.

Mr. BAILEY. I do have. I want to remind the gentleman that it is time someone in California, whether it be the delegation in Congress or the school authorities in California, correct some of the conditions prevailing there. I thought it was bad in the Southern States, but I did not know it was quite so bad as it was in some of the States that claimed to be at the top as far as education is concerned.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TACKETT].

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, this Congress and many before it have often engaged in the consideration of financial aid by our Government to the underprivileged abroad. The point 4 program and many other such foreign aid endeavors, often referred to as bipartisan efforts, have been authorized with little opposition for the purpose of aiding undeveloped areas abroad, rehabilitating and educating the underprivileged on foreign soils, and encouraging the industrial and agricultural activities of those people. Such measures have no difficulty receiving the sanction of this Congress so long as they preclude assistance to the citizenship of the United States.

During my short tenure in Congress, no one has spoken any more frequently than I have for the preservation of the principles of democracy. You know that my theme song has been the continuation of individual initiative, free enterprise, open competition, and vested rights of the States.

Long ago the people of this country made a very definite and wise decision that providing for, maintaining, and operating our schools were public responsibilities.

One of the speakers preceding me today has mentioned the needs of the South for public-school assistance; and another has indicated that other sections of this great Nation are not responsible for the predicament of the South. However, it is my observation that the main and foremost reason why the underprivileged sections of the South have failed to receive Federal assistance in the education of their children is because that great area is within the borders of the United States. If the people in the underprivileged areas of the United States were foreigners, they would find no difficulty in receiving assistance for rehabilitation and educational programs.

Please remember, gentlemen, that only 75 years ago the South was a defeated, torn, stripped, and desolate area, and was being governed by a ruthless mob. Its armies had been defeated in the war of secession, its homes had been destroyed, its barns burned, its farming implements and food provisions stolen, and its livestock driven away. To be sure of its complete destruction, even the open and cultivatable fields were ravished with fire. The manufacturing plants and transportation facilities were torn asunder. There was no Marshall plan and there has never been a point 4 program for the South; but to be certain that the South would starve, for 12 years the people were forced to live under the carpetbag rule of the hellacious reconstruction era, wherein what little was left after the war was gobbled up by these carpetbagging storm troopers.

The South is the only people ever defeated on the battlefields by the United States Army who were not later fed, clothed, and rehabilitated and its plants and facilities restored by our Government. The great southern area of this country by its own boot straps and with no outside assistance has been able during the short time of 75 years to make greater gains in every economic undertaking than any other section of the United States. I might add that during any period of time of these 75 years, the South has made greater advancements in every phase of our economy than any other section of this country; but, remember, gentlemen, that we started from nothing and cannot by any stretch of the imagination be expected to be on equal footing with more fortunate areas.

The raw product is taken from the South, manufactured in the North and East, and in turn sold back to us in the South plus the manufacturer's costs, which always amount to the greater portion of the over-all profit. I have always believed that a portion of such profit should be paid to us in the form of Federal aid to education for our children. So long as we have the unfair and discriminatory freight rates in the South—which is nothing less than paying reparations—we will never be able to compete with the manufacturing centers of the East and North; therefore, we are certainly entitled to some break for the welfare of our respective underprivileged communities.

Raising our living and educational standards go hand in hand. We don't expect to always live in a poor State, but will continuously fight for every opportunity to enhance the over-all economic conditions of our area. It has been suggested that the people in Detroit and New York, for instance, are not responsible for the education of the children residing in Arkansas. Children reared in Arkansas, or any other State, are not denied the right to at some time in life reside in the State of New York or the State of Michigan; in fact, a very small percentage of the people in New York or Michigan were born in those States. It is my understanding that approximately 60 percent of the people within the various States of this country were born and reared outside the State. Were it not for the trade relations existing throughout this great country of ours whereby New York and the other eastern and northern cities have been able to obtain so much trade profit from such States as Arkansas, then New York and other such wealthier States would be in no better position to educate her children than we are in the State of Arkansas.

Our unified system of governmental operations between the States and the interstate trade relations are such that some educational equalization system should be enacted which would afford the boy and girl in the forks of the creek within the poorer areas, an equal opportunity to prepare themselves for the battle of life in this great world of competition with the boy and girl in the metropolitan areas of the North and East.

Surely you will not contend that the school children residing within the wealthy industrial areas are entitled to better educational facilities and possibilities than those of the rural communities. Let us take the proposition down to your own local congressional district. There would be no thriving towns or cities within any of your districts were it not for the trade relations of the people of those areas with at least the local rural communities thereabout. The rural people in those surrounding trade areas of your big towns and cities leave with the people of those metropolitan areas the profits upon trade exchange. There are more people with more money within your metropolitan areas with which to pay taxes for school purposes than there are in the rural localities thereabout. Would you contend that those rural people who have by their trade made possible the towns and cities, are not entitled to equal educational opportunities?

Half of the city of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., is within my congressional district of Arkansas. The other half of that city lies within the State of Texas. Let us suppose that the State of Texas were a hundred times as rich as it is, and that the State of Arkansas were a hundred times poorer than it is. Could it be argued that a child living on the Arkansas side of the city of Texarkana should be denied equal educational opportunities with his playmate who happened to live one block away on the Texas side of the city? Of course not.

Not many of you here today would quibble over educational assistance to foreign countries. Actually, I don't see but one present on the minority side of the aisle who would object to it, and that is the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That does not apply to me.

Mr. TACKETT. The gentleman is correct. I said that it did not; that you are the one exception.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. You are right. I have not voted for that money to be given away abroad.

I would like to ask you this question—you are talking about equality of education. Do you give it in your State? Do you give equal opportunity for an education to all your citizens?

Mr. TACKETT. Yes, sir. We have the school equalization plan within my State of Arkansas, and it was my pleasure while serving as a member of the Arkansas State Legislature to assist in the adoption of an equalization program which gives to the poorer sections of Arkansas an equal opportunity for educational purposes with those in the wealthier sections.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Do you give it to the colored children? Do you give the colored children education in the white schools with white teachers?

Mr. TACKETT. I will tell you this, Mr. HOFFMAN, you and all the other gentlemen from the North, who are always worrying about how the South conducts its business, should know that the colored boys and girls in Arkansas receive equal educational facilities and possibilities with those of the white boys and girls; and that the colored teachers receive as much for their services—and in many instances more—than the white teachers.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is fine. You make the statement, and I assume you included me, about the folks of the North sticking their noses into the business of the southerners. What you do not happen to know is that in the 16 years I have been here I have never once voted for a poll tax bill or for an anti-lynching bill or for the FEPC.

Mr. TACKETT. All that is beside the point and has absolutely nothing to do with Federal aid to underprivileged schools.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In your State, are colored children permitted to attend white schools? They are in Michigan.

Mr. TACKETT. No. The colored students do not attend public schools with white students, because equal facilities are afforded the colored students. I might add that where equal school facilities with that of the white's are not available to colored students, they are afforded the opportunity of attending schools with white students. For instance, there are colored students now attending the University of Arkansas medical and law schools with white students.

I favor Federal-aid-to-education legislation providing only financial aid, leaving the control and fixing of policies and procedures completely within the discretion of the respective States, to prohibit the possibility of federalization of our schools; and I doubt the wisdom of a general Federal aid bill covering sections of this country wherein the aid and assistance is not needed, but would be willing for the legislation to be limited only to areas in which everything possible has been done to provide adequate school facilities without Federal assistance.

Those suggesting Federal domination over State-controlled schools seem to forget that for many years a number of our school activities, such as the Smith-Hughes program, agricultural extension programs, and others have been subsidized by the Federal Government, and yet the Government has in no wise attempted to infringe upon the local operation and direction of these programs in our educational institutions.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, in my State of Kentucky the average teacher's salary is $1,935, and as a result of the defense work many teachers are leaving their profession and the boards of education are being called upon to staff those schools with substandard certificated teachers and people who are not trained to teach the youth. That is one of the reasons why I state that we need this legislation.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. AYRES. It seems to me that most of the States being discussed here so far as education is concerned affect my home town of Akron, Ohio. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky, the gentleman from West Virginia, and the gentleman from Arkansas for having come from States that have been so prolific because so many of their people have migrated to Akron, Ohio. In fact Akron is commonly known as the capital of West Virginia.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman for his comment.

We all know that both political parties pledged in their platforms Federal aid to education. This has always been a bipartisan issue.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I listened a moment ago to a discussion of the situation in California with respect to the schools and it occurred to me that with the increase in population of some 56 percent in the last 10 years, and due to the fact that there are debt limitations placed in the charters of our cities and school districts, it has been difficult to build schools to take care of all the children of the new families that have come to our State. As a matter of fact, during the war years when, as you know, the building business was held back very materially, it became necessary at times to run two shifts a day in the schools because we could not build the buildings fast enough. Then a third shift in the training of workers for the various skills was required, principally in the aircraft factories, and so forth; and it was a very difficult problem. We are getting out of it and in due course we will have all of our new buildings built. The buildings which were built prior to that time are of the highest quality and are earthquake-proof, as near as possible to make them. So, while we appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from West Virginia, we also appreciate that he does not know what he is talking about as far as California is concerned.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to thank the gentleman. I know that the building problem is one of the great problems facing the school people of this Nation today. I believe that the gentleman from California will agree that part of the trouble in California has been caused by reason of Federal activities, as a result of World War II, and that we have already extended the principle of Federal aid to take care of situations of that kind by the enactment in the Eighty-first Congress of Public Law 815, for school construction, and Public Law 874, for the maintenance and operation of schools in war-impacted school districts. I know that the situation exists. It exists right here in the metropolitan area of the District of Columbia where, because of Federal activities, many children can have school for only half a day. We do have this condition which is one of our main problems. But this Congress has not yet extended that same principle to take care of the rural areas and the States where we are spending a much greater percentage of our income than the national average for our public schools, and we are just letting that situation go by.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the gentleman has a very good point. I think that we in California perhaps appreciate his point more than some other States because we have received so many people from so many different parts of the United States, including that represented by the gentleman from Arkansas as well as the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. I agree with the gentleman, and thank the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. HINSHAW. And we recognize perhaps better than some others that the degree of education and the quality of education varies because we do get people from those other States when their families have moved to California.

I think the principal objection most of us have had to the matter of legislation which has been proposed so far is that the Federal aid to education should apply to the States that are well off as well as those that are not. We would be entirely satisfied in my State to receive nothing in the way of aid to education; we have enough. We want no Federal control whatsoever; we do not want a bureaucracy established which may ultimately achieve Federal control of education.

We appreciate what the gentleman has to say, and I for one would be glad to vote for a bill for aid to only those States which were unable to help themselves.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind the gentleman that there are other special orders; the gentleman from Michigan has a special order following him.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. May I say in reply to the gentleman from California that in all these bills that I am familiar with, particularly the one I introduced, H. R. 545, the Senate bill, and bills introduced by some other Members on the left side of the aisle, I can subscribe in principle to these bills even though they differ from my own. Among other things, they are free of Federal control of our schools. The point I am interested in, just as is the gentleman from California, is that justice be done. The total income of California for the year 1949 was approximately $15,232,000,000. For the same year our total income in Kentucky was $2,186,000,000. It is my idea that to measure the need of the States on a total income basis in relation to the number of children to be educated is a just way to proceed in this matter.

Under my bill, under the Senate bill, and under many bills introduced by other Members of the House, an effort formula is provided; the State must make a certain effort and if they do not make that effort they get less Federal money. They decide for themselves.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If I understood the gentleman correctly he stated that the degree of aid from the Federal Government should be on the basis of the income of the respective States.

Mr. PERKINS. No; I am not measuring their need for aid on the basis of income; you must take into consideration two factors: The number of children to be educated, and the per capita income of the State.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Under that theory if the people in one State worked harder and earned more then they would have to help educate the children of the people in another State who just sat around or went fishing.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman come from a State which helps out the people in Colorado? Is it not true that the people of Michigan help pay the cost of irrigation in the Western States? All of this is in the national interest of the people of the United States.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. To educate the children of these fishermen?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I just made a comparison.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes. The gentleman's argument was that if you made more money in Kentucky than we did in Michigan you should help us carry on our educational program even though we sat around or went hunting and fishing and wasted our time; the gentleman would still help educate us. That is his argument.

Mr. PERKINS. My idea is this: If the State of Michigan makes a greater effort and spends a greater percentage of its total income for educational purposes in the public elementary and secondary schools in the State, and that does not provide the children of Michigan with a fair chance to get a basic education, then we of Kentucky should help the people of the State of Michigan.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 134) electing WALTER S. BARING a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That WALTER S. BARING, of Nevada, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article in regard to air power.

Mr. HILLINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article from the Pasadena Star-News, a letter from the Korean War zone, and a speech by Mr. Homer Crotty, of the State bar of California.

Mr. RADWAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter, a resolution, and an editorial.

Mr. STEED asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. YATES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a speech by the Governor of Illinois, notwithstanding that it exceeds the limit and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $184.50.

Mr. BOYKIN (at the request of Mr. JONES of Alabama) was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. REES of Kansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. WITHROW asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a brief prayer.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article in reference to the evacuation of Boston by the British on March 17, 1776, including footnotes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a verbatim report of impromptu intervention of Philippine Foreign Secretary Carlos P. Romulo during debate on cease-fire in Korea before the United Nations Political and Security Committee, January 22, 1951. We all remember General Romulo served in this body with great distinction. All of us who served with him will always remember him and his outstanding ability as well as his fine personality and his great depth of knowledge. I ask unanimous consent also that this be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD notwithstanding the fact it may run over the amount allowed by the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNE of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address by Hon. James M. Mead, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, at the annual Nation's Sales Conference in the Statler Hotel, New York City.

Mr. HARRIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial from today's Washington Post.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter in each.

Mr. MORANO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article from the Reader's Digest.

Mr. CHATHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a sermon by Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, minister of the Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, and Chaplain of the United States Senate. This sermon entitled "The Righteous Sword," seems to me to answer many people who are groping for guidance in these serious days. I agree with it completely.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK) was given permission to extend his remarks on the subject of the anniversary of the independence of Lithuania.

Mr. KEOGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address by Mr. CELLER.

Mr. FISHER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a speech.

Mr. HINSHAW asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include certain material in tabular form also articles.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. RANKIN (at the request of Mr. TACKETT) was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. McKINNON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include additional material.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, February 15, 1951, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

198. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting the thirty-eighth annual report of the Secretary of Commerce, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

199. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to amend the District of Columbia Teachers' Salary Act of 1947"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

200. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to abolish the Castle Pinckney National Monument and to transfer the jurisdiction and control of the lands therein contained to the Secretary of the Army, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

201. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to amend the act of December 24, 1942 (56 Stat. 1086; 43 U. S. C., sec. 36b), entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire lands or interest in lands for Geological Survey' "; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

202. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to authorize the addition of certain lands to Manassas National Battlefield Park, Va., and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

203. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of certain laws enacted by the Eleventh Guam Congress, pursuant to section 19 of Public Law 630, Eighty-first Congress, the Organic Act for Guam; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

204. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting copies of orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service suspending deportation, as well as a list of the persons involved; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

205. A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated December 22, 1950, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers, on a preliminary examination of Steinhatchee and Fenholloway Rivers, Fla., authorized by the Flood Control Act approved on June 30, 1948; to the Committee on Public Works.

206. A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated December 18, 1950, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers, on a review of reports on the Ohio River, with a view to flood protection along Wheeling Creek and Little Wheeling Creek at and in the vicinity of Wheeling, W. Va., requested by a resolution of the Committee on Public Works, House of Representatives, adopted on July 22, 1947; to the Committee on Public Works.

207. A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated December 26, 1950, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers, on a review of report on the Mississippi River between Coon Rapids Dam and the mouth of the Ohio River, and other reports, with a view to improvements for flood control and drainage on the Fox River, Iowa and Mo., at this time, with particular reference to improvements in Van Buren County, Iowa, requested by a resolution of the Committee on Flood Control, House of Representatives, adopted on July 23, 1946; to the Committee on Public Works.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 29, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, into the calm and confidence of Thy presence we would bring our drained and driven souls that the benediction of Thy peace may fall upon our restless lives. May this little shrine of daily devotion, built by our fathers on the high hill of the Nation, open for us vistas of green pastures and still waters where our jaded souls may be restored.

In a difficult and desperate era, be Thou our pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night, as patiently and obediently we follow the kindly light. May we close our national ranks in a new unity, as deadly peril threatens the birthright of our liberties. Save us from living on a small scale in a great day. In this hour of destiny, O be swift our souls to answer Thee, be jubilant our feet. In Thy name we ask it. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 12, 1951, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

VISIT TO THE SENATE OF THE JAPANESE CONGRESSIONAL AGRICULTURAL MISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have present in this Chamber today a number of distinguished members of the Japanese Diet, who are visiting various places in our country in order to acquaint themselves with American institutions. We are very happy to have them with us in the Senate. The Chair has a list of their names and a statement which Mr. Kataro Mori, the chairman of the delegation, desires to have printed in the RECORD, rather than to be called upon to deliver it on the floor.

The Chair asks the members of the Japanese Diet to rise, so that Members of the Senate may see them.

[The members of the delegation from Japan rose from their seats in the rear of the Chamber and were greeted with applause, Senators rising.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. We all hope that the contacts which are being made between the representatives of the Japanese people and the American people since the end of the late unfortunate war, and their effort to create a new government, new institutions, and new relationships will result in the resumption of the long friendship which, until the late unpleasantness, existed between the people of Japan and the people of the United States, and between the Japanese Government and the Government of the United States. All who find it possible to come here from Japan, and all those in this country who find it possible to visit Japan, contribute to that happy result. Therefore, we welcome the distinguished group from the Japanese legislative body, and the Chair hopes they will profit by their visit to the United States, and will carry back to their people very happy memories of their contact with our people and our Government.

The Chair asks that the statement prepared by the chairman of the delegation and the list of the members of the delegation who are present may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The statement and list of members of the delegation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. KATARO MORI

Mr. President and Senators, it is indeed an honor and a privilege bestowed upon me and members of the Japanese Congressional Agricultural Mission to the United States of America to be so cordially received by this distinguished gathering of United States Senators.

Permit me in behalf of our Government to take this opportunity to convey through you to the American people the greetings of the Japanese people and an expression of their sincere appreciation for the generous food supplies given during the immediate postwar period and for the continued sympathy and understanding of your people. I cannot recall without feeling fresh pain in my heart that dreadful period of acute food shortage. The war's end brought in its wake social chaos and mental apathy. Worst of all, people were on the brink of starvation. This danger was averted mostly by the timely relief of foodstuffs shipped over from your country through the good offices of the occupation authorities. We were touched by the generosity shown by the American people to their former enemy. It is by no means an exaggeration that this relief gave hope and impetus to the man in the street to work for his own salvation and for Japan's rehabilitation. Given a right start, our people have been working hard for the last 5 years, and today I am glad to inform you that our livelihood is improved and our people restored to composure.

The American people are pleased, I am sure, to know that the overwhelming majority of the Japanese people stand today for the cause of democracy and its defense against the Communist menace, both from within and from without. We are fully prepared to offer our contribution to the defense of the peace in east Asia and in the world at large. We are all eager to see that the day will come soon for Japan to join the family of nations as a free and independent nation, and you may be assured that she will stand with the free nations of the world.

The object of our mission is primarily to see on the spot how your agricultural policy is formulated and executed in conformity with the will of the people. We are thankful to the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers and his staff in Tokyo for according us this opportunity of direct observation. We are determined to make the most of our visit for the benefit of Japan's agriculture, farmers, and people in general, and ultimately of the mutual interest of our two peoples. Underlying problems which we face today, apart from those which are in the limelight at the moment, are those of food and population. For the further improvement of our basic agricultural policy and the solution of these difficult problems, we shall need your continuous help, for which, I assure, the Japanese people will be forever grateful.

Since our arrival in the United States a few weeks ago we have experienced the warm friendship and hospitality of the American people in thier homeland. We now better understand the spiritual qualities which motivated the policies and conduct of the occupation in our country. During the years of that occupation a new and closer friendship has been developed between our two countries, based upon the best qualities and characteristics of our peoples. With this solid foundation, we are now able to give a happy end to the unhappy period of our history and to open the door to a bright and fertile future for our two nations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Concurrent Resolution 32

"Concurrent resolution of the senate and assembly memorializing Congress to enact legislation which will exempt employees of the State and the political subdivisions thereof from the present wage stabilization order

"Whereas the Federal Wage Stabilization Board has announced a wage freeze in conjunction with a price freeze at the highest levels between December 19, 1950, and January 25, 1951; and

"Whereas the said wage freeze includes hundreds of thousands of employees of the State and its political subdivisions; and

"Whereas the salaries of government employees have fallen far below the level necessary to maintain a decent standard of living; and

"Whereas this order jeopardizes and forestalls the present wage adjustments which have been promised by State and municipal authorities for such employees: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the people of the State of New York through their representatives in the senate and assembly hereby respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact legislation, if necessary, and the Wage Stabilization Board to promulgate orders which will exempt employees of the State and its political subdivisions from the said wage stabilization order; and it is further

"Resolved (if the assembly concur), That copies of this resolution be forthwith transmitted to Cyrus S. Ching, Chairman of the Wage Stabilization Board, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member of Congress duly elected from the State of New York and that the latter be urged to devote themselves to the task of accomplishing the purpose of this resolution.

"By order of the senate,

"WILLIAM S. KING,
"Secretary.

"In assembly, February 5, 1951, concurred in without amendment.

"By order of assembly.

"ANSLEY B. BORKOWSKI,
"Clerk."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"House Joint Memorial 3

"Memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress thereof to take no steps to establish or to join a world government at this time

"Whereas it is the desire of the Thirty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Colorado to encourage and aid in the establishment of peace among the nations of the world, and it is the firm determination of this same general assembly to preserve the sacred rights of the people of Colorado and of the United States as have been determined by the Declaration of Independence and guaranteed by the Constitutions of the United States and the State of Colorado; and

"Whereas there are in the world today as well as in these United States people who are strenuously endeavoring to establish a world government and to cause the United States to become a member thereof; and

"Whereas it is the sentiment of this thirty-eighth general assembly that the peoples of the world are not yet sufficiently acquainted with or cognizant of the freedoms the American people enjoy to have attained that altruism which is essential to the harmonious and successful realization of peace among nations, the lack of this altruism having been made evident by the dissensions in the United Nations; and

"Whereas the organization of the world government as proposed is of a nature such that the people of the United States will be required to surrender part of their sovereignty to nations which have no concept of world peace and cooperation; and

"Whereas the sentiment of the Thirty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Colorado is not in accord with the whole intention expressed by the Thirty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Colorado: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives of the thirty-eighth general assembly (the senate concurring therein), That the President and the Congress of the United States be and are hereby petitioned to make no effort to create or join any world government whatsoever until there shall have been displayed by the peoples of the world sufficient altruism, and such desire to have and willingness to sacrifice to assure world peace and stability that it will unquestionably be established, but that their endeavors shall be such as will strengthen the cooperative efforts of the United Nations; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this joint memorial be immediately forwarded to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Member from Colorado of the Congress of the United States.

"DAVID A. HAMIL,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.
"K. EVELYN MILLER,
"Assistant Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.
"GORDON ALLOTT,
"President of the Senate.
"MILDRED H. CRESSWELL,
"Secretary of the Senate."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"A concurrent resolution memorializing the President and Congress of the United States to promptly take all measures necessary to complete the St. Lawrence waterway.

"Whereas representatives of the Governments of the United States and of the Dominion of Canada in 1941 consummated and signed an agreement for the development of the St. Lawrence, both for navigation and power purposes, so as to permit free passage of ocean-going ships from the Atlantic Ocean to the head of the Great Lakes and into the heart of the American continent, and make available the development of this great potential source of electric energy for necessary public use; and

"Whereas the Presidents of the United States for the past 31 years have committed themselves to the development of the St. Lawrence River and President Harry S. Truman has characterized the St. Lawrence project as of economic value comparable to the Panama Canal and a vital necessity as a defense measure; and

"Whereas world developments of the past few months and the existence of the present national emergency require in the national defense the development of this inland waterway as an additional means of transportation for the great industries located on the Great Lakes and the agriculture of the northwest States; and

"Whereas the State of Minnesota, through its legislature, for the last 31 years, has affirmed its continued support of this project, and through the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Commission of Minnesota has continuously promoted the development of the St. Lawrence River, believing that the project is a vital necessity for the stimulation and development of the resources of this State and of the entire Northwest, as well as a great economic advantage to the Nation, and that the project has already been too long delayed: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the senate (the house of representatives concurring) commend and support the President of the United States in his steadfast, consistent, and energetic support of this project, and urge the Congress of the United States, without further delay, to take all measures necessary to bring about the speedy completion of this great project as a vital defense and economic necessity; be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the President, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

"ELMER ANDERSON,
"President of the Senate.
"JOHN A. HARTLE,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.
"Approved February 8, 1951.
"LUTHER YOUNGDAHL,
"Governor of the State of Minnesota."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana; to the Committee on Public Works:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 3

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to enact effective legislation providing for flood control in the Wabash River watershed area and tributaries thereto

"Whereas each year the overflow of the many rivers, streams, creeks, and tributaries which empty into the Wabash River creates a flood condition imperiling life and causing property damage throughout the entire Wabash Valley, contributing at the same time to similar conditions which exist in the southern States through which the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers flow; and

"Whereas the specific consequences of such flood conditions are: silting and sedimentation of stream channels, reservoirs, dams, ditches, and harbors; loss of soil and water; an increase in the speed and volume of rainfall run-off, causing severe and increasing floods, which bring suffering, disease, and death, impoverishment of families, damage to roads, highways, railways, buildings, and other property from floods; and losses in navigation, hydroelectric power, municipal water supply, and underground water reserve: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring):

"SECTION 1. The Eighty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Indiana does hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to enact effective legislation for the control of floods and the prevention of soil erosion, to preserve natural resources, prevent impairment of dams and reservoirs, assist in maintaining the navigability of rivers, protect and promote the health, safety, and general welfare of the people, and to appropriate sufficient funds for the execution of such legislation.

"SEC. 2. The secretary of the senate is directed to forward copies of this resolution to the Secretary of the United States Senate, to the Clerk of the National House of Representatives, and to each United States Senator and Congressman from Indiana."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana; to the Committee on Finance:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 5

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to enact a law relieving all members of the Armed Forces now on active duty from paying any Federal income tax on any compensation received by such members for services performed as a member of the Armed Forces

"Whereas during the World War II members of the Armed Forces were not required to pay any Federal income tax on any compensation received for services performed in the Armed Forces; and

"Whereas the present members of the Armed Forces are required to pay Federal income tax: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana (the house of representatives concurring):

"SECTION 1. That the Eighty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Indiana hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact a law to relieve all members of the Armed Forces now on active duty from paying any Federal income tax on any compensation received from the Government in payment of services performed by them as members of the Armed Forces.

"SEC. 2. That a certified copy of this resolution be sent to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of the Senate and to the presiding officer of each House of the National Congress, and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from Indiana."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Public Works:

"Senate Joint Memorial 5

"Memorial to Harry S. Truman, President of the United States; James E. Murray and Zales N. Ecton, Senators from Montana; Joseph C. O'Mahoney and Lester C. Hunt, Senators from Wyoming; Carl Hayden, Senator from Arizona, and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee; Mike Mansfield and Wesley D'Ewart, Congressmen from Montana; William Harrison, Congressman from Wyoming; Clarence Cannon, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee; Oscar Chapman, Secretary of the Interior; Michael Straus, Commissioner of Reclamation; Dillon Meyer, Commissioner of Indian Affairs; Frank Pace, Jr., Director of the Budget, requesting the introduction and enactment into law of the necessary and proper legislation authorizing that sufficient appropriations be provided the Bureau of Reclamation for the immediate construction of Yellowtail Dam located in Big Horn County in southern Montana

"Whereas Yellowtail Dam site is located on the Big Horn River in Big Horn County, in southeastern Montana, and the Yellowtail Dam will be constructed across the Big Horn River about three-fourths of a mile above the mouth of Big Horn Canyon—about 35 miles southwest of Hardin, Mont., and 44 miles southeast of Billings, Mont.; and

"Whereas, the Bureau of Reclamation was authorized by section 9 of the Flood Control Act of 1944, as an integral part of the Missouri River Basin project to prepare preliminary surveys for the construction of Yellowtail Dam; and

"Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation has completed preconstruction surveys, and work necessary for full construction work, and said surveys—including those of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Public Power Commission, and other interested Federal agencies—are now in the hands, or are ready to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Oscar Chapman, to be presented by him to the Congress and the President of the United States; and

"Whereas our Nation is now, of necessity, embarking upon a period of rearmament and defense planning, the ultimate end of which no man can foresee; and

"Whereas electrical energy is of the greatest importance in any defense industry. Already, and with industrial mobilization only just beginning, there is consideration being given to the necessity of enforcing electrical brown-outs in certain areas; and

"Whereas there is remaining no potential and undeveloped power site comparable to Yellowtail Dam. The Yellowtail power plant, as projected, will have an installed capacity of 200,000 kilowatts with an estimated annual firm energy capacity averaging 584,000,000 kilowatt-hours. In addition to this firm energy, this Yellowtail power plant is expected to have an average annual nonfirm energy output of 163,920,000 kilowatt-hours, bringing the average total estimated production to approximately 748,000,000 kilowatt-hours; and

"Whereas irrigation is one of the additional important contributions Yellowtail Dam will make to the economy of the area, and that of the Nation as a whole. Approximately 45,000 acres of irrigable land will be placed under the ditch by waters made available by Yellowtail Dam. In addition, there are a number of desirable pumping units along the Big Horn, Tongue, Powder, and Yellowstone Rivers that will be made feasible by low-cost power derived from Yellowtail Dam, which will serve to irrigate some 180,000 additional acres, or an approximate total of 225,000 acres, of fertile land will be brought into production of food essential to our Nation's on-coming-wartime needs; and

"Whereas Montana has an immense, and mostly undeveloped, mineral wealth, that should be contributing to our Nation's defense program. (Herbert Hoover has stated that Montana possesses a greater mineral potential than the U. S. S. R.) The time may come, before this emergency shall pass, when Montana's minerals may be desperately needed. The low-cost power that Yellowtail Dam will provide will be a tremendous asset in bringing these minerals to a usable stage; and

"Whereas Yellowtail Dam, in addition to providing hydroelectric power and irrigation, will also bring a vast contribution to flood control, silt and soil control, conservation of fish and wildlife, recreational development, and other related and beneficial uses too numerous to mention for the benefit of all mankind; and

"Whereas Yellowtail Dam will be an arch-type, concrete structure, towering about 500 feet above the river bed, with a crest of 1,480 feet, and a storage capacity of some 1,366,000 acre-feet, and will flood about 27 square miles of almost totally unusable land. The lake so created by Yellowtail Dam will extend for 75 miles through tortuously winding, steeply walled canyons, flooding land that is of no economic value. Yellowtail Dam will be exceeded in size only by Boulder, Shasta, Grand Coulee, and Hungry Horse in the order named, and will cost approximately $100,000,000, which, by the sale of power, irrigation, and other benefits, will be repaid to the Federal Treasury through a 50-year period: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Thirty-second Legislative Assembly of Montana of 1951 now in session (the senate and house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully urged and requested to make such funds immediately available that may be necessary to start construction of Yellowtail Dam in Big Horn County in southeastern Montana at once; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Crow Tribe, upon whose lands the site of Yellowtail Dam is situated, be adequately and fairly compensated for the site at a price agreed upon by the Federal Power Commission, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Bureau of Reclamation, and the Crow Tribe; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this Yellowtail Dam memorial be submitted by the secretary of state, Sam Mitchell of the State of Montana to the President of the Senate, Mr. Alben Barkley; the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Sam Rayburn; the Governor of the State of Wyoming, Paul Barrett; the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Wyoming; the regional director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, Paul Fickinger; the regional director of Land Management, Albin Molohon; the regional director of the Bureau of Reclamation, Kenneth Vernon; and the district director of the Bureau of Reclamation, D. C. Ketcham.

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"House Memorial 1

"To Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; Hon. CHARLES E. WILSON, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION; Hon. W. STUART SYMINGTON, CHAIRMAN OF THE NATIONAL SECURITIES RESOURCES BOARD; Hon. OSCAR CHAPMAN, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR; THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE AND THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES; and to Hon. E. L. BARTLETT, DELEGATE TO CONGRESS FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA:

"Your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Alaska, respectfully represents:

"Whereas the opportunity exists for a major contribution to be made to the defense effort and the national economy by developing the tremendous potential hydroelectric power resources of Alaska; and

"Whereas a private company has signified its willingness to develop at its own expense the so-called Taiya hydroelectric power project in southeast Alaska and to install an aluminum reduction plant which would produce a large quantity of this metal so urgently required by the Nation; and

"Whereas statements have appeared in the press that this outstanding Alaska project is being deferred in favor of a similar project at Kitimat, British Columbia, whose construction would be made possible only by the United States defense officials negotiating a contract for purchase of a large quantity of aluminum from the Canadian producer; and

"Whereas the Taiya project in Alaska possesses many features of superiority over the Kitimat project in British Columbia, namely:

"1. Construction could start sooner and be completed at an earlier date because in contrast to the proposed Kitimat site, Taiya adjoins a well-developed harbor and town at Skagway, Alaska, which provides services and facilities allowing an immediate start to be made on the work, and which has good transportation connections including a new airport recently constructed by the Territory of Alaska, a railroad extending all through the area where the power development would occur and a new road direct to the proposed plant site at Dyea.

"2. The power at Taiya would be developed by the diversion of the headwaters of the Yukon River through large tunnels under the coast range which would be immune to enemy attack in contrast to the Kitimat project which entails the construction of a large dam.

"3. The Taiya project entails no transmission of power as the power plant would be right at the reduction plant site in contrast to the Kitimat project which would require transmission of power 55 miles over a high mountain range where lines would be subject to severe icing conditions and snow and rock slides.

"4. The ultimate power-producing capability at Taiya is greater than at Kitimat and the unit cost thereof cheaper. All of which considerations strongly recommend the Taiya project over that proposed for Kitimat; and

"Whereas construction of the power and electrometallurgical project at Taiya would contribute greatly, both during the present emergency and in the future, to the economic development of Alaska, which has been declared to be a national policy; and

"Whereas the private American company desiring to build this plant in Alaska has stated 'if we are granted governmental assistance comparable to that which is suggested would be given the Canadian company in connection with its proposed British Columbia development, we will undertake the Alaska project and carry it through to an early completion'; and

"Whereas the Territory of Alaska has an official interest in this matter by reason of the fact that great effort has been expended by the Territorial agencies, including the Alaska Development Board, in bringing the Taiya project to its present state of readiness for early development;

"Now, therefore, your memorialist the House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska, in twentieth regular session assembled, respectfully urges that the Congress of the United States, in consultation with the national-defense authorities, reexamine immediately the situation with respect to the Taiya project and its proposed alternatives in Canada to the end that this large development shall take place on American soil; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted by telegram immediately after adoption to Delegate BARTLETT in Washington for filing with the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee which has announced it will investigate this matter.

"And your memorialist will ever pray.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. 445. A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to authorize assistance to States and their subdivisions in the development and maintenance of local public health units, and for other purposes; with an amendment (Rept. No. 96).

INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND STATES AND MUNICIPALITIES—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE (S. REPT. NO. 94)

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, submitted a report relating to the study of intergovernmental relationships between the United States and States and municipalities, which was ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE AND VOCATIONAL EDUCATION ACTS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I report favorably, with amendments, Senate bill 337, to amend the Public Health Service Act and the Vocational Education Act of 1946, to provide an emergency 5-year program of grants and scholarships for education in the fields of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, dental hygiene, public health, and nursing professions, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 95) thereon.

On behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], and the Senator from California [Mr. NIXON] be added as cosponsors of the original bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received, and the bill will be placed on the calendar, and, without objection, the request to add the names of additional cosponsors is agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. IVES:

S. 867. A bill for the relief of Frank N. W. Doodha, Kay Doodha, Eugenie Frances Maureen Doodha, and Frank Norman Winthrop Doodha, Jr.;

S. 868. A bill for the relief of Carlo Silvestrelli and his wife, Geneva; and

S. 869. A bill for the relief of Marie Cafcalaki; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HENDRICKSON:

S. 870. A bill for the relief of Dr. Robert S. Amritt; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas:

S. 871. A bill granting the consent of the Congress to the negotiation of a compact relating to the waters of the Sabine River by the States of Texas and Louisiana; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(Mr. SMITH of New Jersey (for himself, Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BENTON, Mr. CLEMENTS, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. DUFF, Mr. FLANDERS, Mr. HENDRICKSON, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. HILL, Mr. IVES, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. KILGORE, Mr. KNOWLAND, Mr. MCMAHON, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. NEELY, Mr. NIXON, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. PASTORE, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, Mr. TAFT, Mr. THYE, Mr. TOBEY, and Mr. YOUNG) introduced Senate bill 872, to furnish emergency food aid to India, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 873. A bill to amend section 32 of the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917, as amended, so as to permit the return under such section of property which an alien acquired by gift, trust, annuity, devise, bequest, inheritance, or as beneficiary of any insurance policy from an American citizen or national and to provide that in any present or future conflict similar property be held in trust for such enemy alien by courts of competent jurisdiction or by an agency of the Government appointed by the President, subject to the use of the United States Government for the successful conclusion of hostilities, to be returned to such alien after the end of hostilities under certain conditions as set out herein; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 874. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to reclassify the salaries of postmasters, officers, and employees of the postal service; to establish uniform procedure for computing compensation; and for other purposes," approved July 6, 1945, with respect to certain employees in the railway mail service; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado:

S. 875. A bill for the relief of Col. Francis B. Upham; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 876. A bill to extend the benefits of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Air Corps," approved June 16, 1936, as amended, to certain former officers in the Army Air Forces who were erroneously commissioned in the Army of the United States rather than in the Air Corps Reserve; to the Committee on Armed Services.

(Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina introduced Senate bill 877, to prescribe terms of office for members of the Civil Service Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. LANGER introduced Senate Joint Resolution 33, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to terms of office of President, and providing for nomination of candidates for President and Vice President, and for election of such candidates, by popular vote, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

EMERGENCY FOOD AID TO INDIA

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLEMENTS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUFF], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], my colleague the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the senior Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the junior Senator from California [Mr. NIXON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to furnish emergency food aid to India.

I am very much gratified, Mr. President, that such a large and distinguished bipartisan group of Senators has joined in sponsoring this bill, the purpose of which is to provide food grains available in the United States to help the people of India overcome a very serious famine situation which threatens them this year. As Senators know, the President sent a message to Congress on Monday last recommending legislation for this purpose.

The sponsors of this bill do not pretend that it is perfect, and I am sure that its various provisions will be thoroughly considered in the Foreign Relations Committee and on the floor of the Senate. But the bill as it now stands does represent an intensive study of the matter over a period of several weeks by a considerable number of Senators on both sides of the aisle, in consultation with the executive departments concerned and with interested citizen groups.

For my own part, I wish to say only that I have joined in this bill in a spirit which I believe is in the best American tradition—the spirit of neighborly assistance for human beings in distress. To my mind the fact that we are in clear opposition to the Government of India in vital matters of far eastern policy should not enter at all into our consideration of how best we can come to the aid of the Indian people in their hour of need.

That need is urgent, Mr. President, and I know all the sponsors of this bill join in the hope that the Senate will give it speedy and favorable consideration.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, together with an explanatory statement on behalf of the sponsors, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 872) to furnish emergency food aid to India, introduced by Mr. SMITH of New Jersey (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "India Emergency Food Aid Act of 1951."

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this act to serve the cause of world peace and thus provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency food assistance to the people of India in order to alleviate starvation and mass suffering threatened by famine conditions in that country.

SEC. 3. In order to carry out the purposes of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President during the period ending December 31, 1951, sufficient funds to provide not in excess of 2,000,000 long tons of food grains and to provide for such administrative expenses as are not covered by local currency furnished by the Government of India in accordance with sections 4 and 5 of this act: Provided, That the expenditures authorized hereunder shall be for the sole purpose of meeting the emergency need in India arising during the period ending December 31, 1951.

SEC. 4. No assistance under authority of this act shall be made available until an agreement is entered into between India and the United States containing the following undertakings, and any others the President may determine to be desirable to carry out the purposes of this act, on the part of India:

(a) To distribute the supplies made available under this act, as well as similar supplies obtained locally or imported from outside sources by the Government of India, among the people of India without discrimination as to race, creed, or political belief.

(b) To give full and continuous publicity in India to the assistance furnished by the United States.

(c) To permit persons designated by the Government of the United States to observe without restriction the distribution in India of supplies made available under authority of this act.

(d) To deposit in a special account amounts of the currency of India equivalent to the amounts of such currency accruing to the Government of India from the import and sale of commodities furnished as a grant hereunder, this account to be utilized as may be agreed upon by the United States and the Government of India for the benefit of the people of India in programs to increase food production and in other projects and programs in the mutual interest of the United States and India.

(e) To make available to the Government of the United States from the account established in subsection (d) local currency in the amounts required by it to meet its local currency administrative and operating expenses in India in connection with assistance supplied by the United States.

(f) To pursue all appropriate measures to reduce its relief needs and to increase production and supply and improve distribution of foodstuffs within India so as to lessen the danger of similar emergencies in the future.

SEC. 5. Local currency made available to the United States by India under the provisions of the agreement required by section 4 may be used for local currency administrative and operating expenses in India in connection with assistance provided by the United States without charge against appropriated funds.

SEC. 6. All or any portion of the funds made available under authority of this act may be transferred by the President to any department or agency of the executive branch of the Government to be expended for the purpose of this act. Funds so transferred may be expended under the authority of any provisions of law not inconsistent with this act applicable to the departments or agencies concerned, except that funds so transferred shall not be commingled with other funds of such departments or agencies and shall be accounted for separately.

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed, until such time as an appropriation shall be made pursuant to section 3 of this act, to make advances not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000,000 to carry out the provisions and purposes of this act in such manner, at such time, and in such amounts as the President shall determine, and no interest shall be charged on advances made by the Treasury to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for this purpose. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be repaid without interest for advances made by it hereunder from funds made available to any department or agency for the purpose of this act: Provided, That to the extent that private shipping is not available on reasonable terms and conditions for the transportation of supplies made available under this act, funds may be advanced hereunder to the Department of Commerce for activation and operation of additional vessels from the national defense reserve fleet for such transportation: Provided further, That notwithstanding the provisions of any other act, receipts from such operations may be used by the Department of Commerce to repay such advances.

SEC. 8. All or any part of the assistance provided hereunder shall be terminated by the President whenever he, or Congress by concurrent resolution, determines that because of changed conditions continuation of assistance is unnecessary or undesirable. Termination of assistance to India under this section may include the termination of deliveries of all supplies scheduled under this act and not yet delivered.

The statement presented by Mr. SMITH of New Jersey is as follows:

BACKGROUND STATEMENT ON BILL FOR EMERGENCY AID TO INDIA

The purpose of the bill introduced today for emergency food aid to India is stated at the beginning of the bill in these words: "to serve the cause of world peace and thus provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency food assistance to the people of India in order to alleviate starvation and mass suffering threatened by famine conditions in that country."

THE FOOD EMERGENCY IN INDIA

This bill is the result of careful study of the emergency food situation in India by interested Members of Congress. The emergency grew out of a series of natural disasters in the grain-producing areas of India, which seriously reduced the harvests of late 1950 and early 1951 and have brought about a net food grain deficit for the whole country estimated at between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 long tons. This deficit directly affects the food rationing system now in effect in certain regions of India, on which approximately one-third of the population depends. The seriousness of the situation is emphasized by the recent reduction of the per capita grain ration in some areas from 12 ounces to 9 ounces per day, which is well below the normal subsistence level.

To meet the threatened deficit for 1951, the Indian Government has purchased or is in the process of purchasing some 3,000,000 tons of grain on the world market, including the United States, and has stated her intention of purchasing an additional amount close to 1,000,000 tons.

In view of the threatened residual deficit, India on December 16, 1950, formally requested the United States to make available 2,000,000 tons in time to meet the emergency expected during the summer of 1951.

EMERGENCY AID IS IN UNITED STATES INTEREST

The sponsors of this bill are convinced that it is clearly in the interest of the United States, and within its capacity, to meet the request from India. A rejection of this appeal would mean widespread starvation during 1951 and a serious blow to the efforts of the new Indian republic to achieve economic and political stability and progress. Bearing in mind the position of India as the second most populous nation in the world and a natural leader in Asian affairs, such a development could have adverse effects throughout the area of non-Communist Asia, seriously hampering the growing efforts of countries in that area to solve their social and economic problems within a framework of political democracy.

United States aid in this emergency, on the other hand, would furnish a concrete demonstration of the friendly attitude of the American people for the people of India, and would be in harmony with our national tradition of relieving human distress.

As to the capacity of the United States, the current grain carry-over amounts to some 375,000,000 bushels. If the maximum of 2,000,000 tons should be shipped to India, this would amount to about 74,000,000 bushels, a quantity which could be spared without endangering the grain position in this country.

GENERAL PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

Following are the salient provisions of the bill which deserve comment:

1. An appropriation is authorized sufficient to provide up to 2,000,000 long tons of food grains to India, plus necessary administrative expenses. It is expected that the major part of the grain will be wheat. The President, in his message to Congress of February 12, expressed his intention of requesting initially an appropriation to provide 1,000,000 tons. Facts already available make it clear that at least that amount will be needed, and an immediate appropriation for that amount will make it possible to get shipments under way in time to meet the emergency. The size of any further appropriation request will depend on on-the-spot studies to be made by officials of the Economic Cooperation Administration as to the remaining requirements of India and the degree to which those requirements can be met from other sources.

The appropriations authorized do not include the cost of ocean shipping, for which India is prepared to pay.

2. The bill requires that before any aid is provided an agreement must be entered into under the terms of which the Government of India will undertake to distribute food supplies, including those provided under this act, without discrimination as to race, creed, or political belief; to give full publicity to American assistance; to permit United States representatives to observe the grain distribution; to set up a counterpart fund equivalent to the proceeds from sale by the Indian Government of United States relief grain, this fund to be used to increase India's food production and for other projects in the mutual interest of the United States and India; to make available local currency for on-the-spot administrative expenses of American personnel in connection with this program; and to take appropriate measures to lessen the danger of similar future emergencies.

3. The President is authorized to transfer funds made available under this act to any department or agency of the Government. A number of agencies may be involved in the program, although it is anticipated that the Economic Cooperation Administration will have the major administrative responsibility.

4. The bill authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make advances not exceeding $50,000,000, at the direction of the President, to carry out the purposes of the act, such advances to be repaid without interest out of appropriated funds. This provision will make possible immediate preparatory action, particularly with respect to shipping, pending appropriation by Congress.

It is particularly provided that advances may be made to the Department of Commerce for activation and operation of ships from the so-called "moth ball" fleet, to the extent that this is necessary to supplement private shipping. Since India will pay the cost of ocean transportation on "moth ball" ships as well as other vessels, it is expected that any advance to the Commerce Department for operation of reserve ships will be repaid out of receipts for the services of these vessels, and the bill provides that such receipts may be used for this purpose.

5. Finally, the bill provides that the President shall terminate assistance under the act whenever he, or Congress by concurrent resolution, determines that continued aid is unnecessary or undesirable.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

Two aspects of this bill deserve special mention. First, the bill provides that the aid shall be furnished to India on an outright basis rather than as a loan or in exchange for money or other economic considerations. The initial Indian request expressed India's willingness to try to repay the aid requested, but from the facts now available it appears that India is not in a position to repay the United States for this consumption item in the foreseeable future without seriously jeopardizing her own domestic economy and thus making necessary further assistance. It is expected that the complex economic factors bearing on this question will be fully explored in committee.

The second important aspect of the bill is the omission of all political conditions. This is a deliberate decision of the sponsors, and is based on the belief that, as stated in a letter sent by certain of the present sponsors to the President on January 30, 1951, "the need to prevent starvation is entirely separate from all political considerations." It is recognized that differences exist between India and the United States on questions of international policy, particularly with respect to the Chinese Communist aggression in Korea. But it is the spirit of this bill that the people of India who are threatened with famine and starvation deserve to be assisted entirely on the merits of their predicament—entirely aside from the wisdom or unwisdom of the policies of their government.

CONCLUSION

This bill is offered out of genuine concern for the serious food predicament facing the people of India, and after thorough consultation with appropriate agencies of the executive branch. In view of the urgent time factor involved, the sponsors hope that this bill will receive the earliest possible action consistent with thorough consideration of the issues involved.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may make a brief statement in connection with the bill which has just been introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] providing for aid to India in the form of grain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from New York may proceed.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I am very happy to be associated with the senior Senator from New Jersey and with many other distinguished Members of this body in sponsoring the bill introduced today to provide emergency assistance to the people of India, to help alleviate the terrible privations which are threatened in that country as a result of natural forces beyond their control.

The American people have always had the deepest affection for and interest in the people of India. We have long sympathized with their aspirations for independence. For many years popular sentiment in this country had urged upon the British Empire the great boon of granting independence to this country of 300,000,000 people.

Certainly it is in our interest to see that these people are not exposed to the extreme rigors of famine, insofar as it is within our power to prevent it.

This is not a question of sitting in judgment on the political policies of the Indian Government toward Pakistan or toward Kashmir or toward us. Those are questions which must be worked out in the political sphere, and on which judgment must be passed in the political sphere.

It is not particularly pertinent at this moment to conjecture what India might have done to prevent the threatened calamity. The calamity is now impending. When a neighbor's house is on fire, we do not stop to reproach him for having failed in the past to have it fireproofed.

We should urge the Government of India to devote any local currency obtained as a result of our aid to the improvement of the conditions which have contributed to the present danger. Provision for such an undertaking is included in the bill we have today introduced.

India is a land of almost 300,000,000 people—300,000,000 people whose institutions are devoted to the expansion of freedom. Our struggle today is for the protection and expansion of the areas of freedom in the world. Anything which threatens disaster in that area threatens us. Anything which we can practically do to shore up the free world should be done.

The proposal to provide aid to India is one which, if carried through in the spirit in which it was conceived, namely, of humanitarianism and of enlightened self-interest, will bring many benefits. It will raise our prestige throughout Asia. It will demonstrate to the people of all the free world, and perhaps even some of those behind the iron curtain, that we are willing to give some of our resources to help other peoples wherever and whenever we can, and that we do not insist on absolute conformity as a condition of our giving aid.

But most of all, the chief benefit should be, and will be, the knowledge in our own hearts and spirits that we have done the right thing, the generous thing, the human thing.

I may add, Mr. President, that this proposal has evoked a very favorable response in the national press. I call special attention to six editorials from leading newspapers throughout the Nation, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer of February 5, 1951]

UNITED STATES GRAIN FOR INDIA

It is encouraging to find that 24 influential Senators and Representatives of both parties are sponsoring the proposal to contribute 2,000,000 tons of foodstuffs to India, to avert imminent famine there, in spite of India's failure to support the American position in the United Nations. This is wise. For if ever this country began to use its surpluses of basic foodstuffs as a weapon to coerce hungry peoples into acceptance of our political policy, we shall be asking for the enmity of the world.

India's need for food supplies is now quite clear. Her request was made about 6 weeks ago. The State Department has made its own investigation of the facts, and has found the danger of famine and widespread deaths to be a real danger. It is taken for granted that the administration will recommend aid to India, chiefly in bread grains, although it has not done so yet.

To be sure, the Government of India and the Indian delegation to the UN have been increasingly unsatisfactory. India was the leader of the bloc in the UN which opposed stamping Red China an aggressor. India has sometimes played Russia's game, in its effort to iron out the Russian-American cleavage—to reconcile the irreconcilable.

It would be easy to stall on India's request for food, and to let it be known unobtrusively that American foodstuffs are reserved for those who stand with us on the great issues of world politics. That might bring results. But that would be a dangerous game to play. It would invite the Indians and other peoples of Asia to believe that the ugly things said of America's motives and policy by Soviet propagandists were true. It would appear to Asians as proof that the great Western Powers are still determined to treat Asian peoples as pawns.

The wiser course is to treat India's hunger as a wholly separate problem, to be dealt with on the merits, and in the light of America's traditional humanitarian spirit. In the long run, this will do far more than coercive or punitive pressure to win the Indians to full support of the American viewpoint on world political issues.

There will be opposition in Congress to the allocation of food to India. And that opposition will be understandable. But such a question needs to be handled, not in terms of any tactical advantage we may get, but in terms of long-range strategy. And the wise strategy is to act decently and generously. For India is not an enemy. Its opposition to some measures we have sought is not inspired by any pro-Soviet alinement, but only by a difference of opinion with us as to the best way to assure peace in the Far East.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of February 5, 1951]

TO HELP INDIA

Americans have a great deal to say about the ways in which Soviet Russia dictates to its satellites or attempts to dictate to other nations. They will need to watch their own thinking that they do not fall into some of the same pitfalls of power with reference to the request of India for 2,000,000 tons of grain.

India needs the grain to meet famine conditions, while the United States could spare this 75,000,000 bushels of wheat and still have 300,000,000 bushels in storage. Though some wheat could earlier have been purchased from Pakistan, that grain is not now available. And though India has diverted some land to cotton and jute, its own wheat acreage has been increased 8 percent in the last year.

There will be a severe temptation in some quarters to try to penalize India for its reluctance to go along with American efforts in the United Nations to indict Communist China for aggression in Korea. Yet if America does stand for freedom of honest thought here is a place to prove it. Hungry people in India should not be obliged to forswear their leaders' convictions in order to obtain bread from a friendly power.

The Indian Government has not asked for a gift of grain but rather for opportunity to purchase it on long-term credit. It would be more humanitarian and probably more realistic simply to make a grant of the wheat.

If Congress is reluctant to release the wheat without at least partial payment, it would be a very good idea to set aside any payments received and use them for technical assistance (point 4 aid) to India in solving its agricultural problems or for American scholarships to Indian students.

In any event, two points are important about this request for aid: Congress should act promptly in order not to prolong distress; and Congress should act magnanimously in order to prove the nature of American motives in world affairs.

[From the Salt Lake City Tribune of February 7, 1951]

PLAYING POLITICS WITH HUNGER MIGHT HURT US WORSE THAN THE STIFF-NECKED NEHRU

The question of sending grain to save a million starving natives of India puts on trial the conscience and good intentions of the American people. It also poses a severe test of our hard practicality in world politics.

Some observers believe that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which turned a cold shoulder to the Indian request for aid, will moderate in time, especially since India failed in its vigorous efforts to block branding Communist China the aggressor in Korea.

That India has no intention of kowtowing to the United States Senate was demonstrated this week, however, when its UN delegate, Sir Benegal N. Rau, refused to continue serving on the United Nations good offices committee. The aim of this committee is to seek a settlement of the Korean conflict.

So what could develop into a serious cold war may be developing with the only important Asiatic nation which has made a strong pretense of being on the side of the free world.

It is natural that Senators should be irritated over the appeasement policies of Prime Minister Nehru. It is only natural that Americans should be more than a little bitter about philanthropy, especially in view of Russia's changed attitude since World War II and the growing hostility of the Chinese. Both received much assistance from us in the past. There are convincing arguments for being rigidly realistic in our foreign relations—based on the assumption that Uncle Sugar has been played for a sucker in the past. The question is, What is realistic? We cannot carry the whole world on our shoulders, to be sure. We cannot play the rich uncle to every poverty-stricken country. But what of our oft-repeated boast that humanitarian motives rather than politics prompt our aid programs?

How realistic would it be to exhibit before the world a kind of polite blackmail in which the Indian people are told to conform with our policies or starve? On the other hand, we must not be put into the position of bribing the Indians with food under threat they will turn against us if we don't. We can't buy friendship directly.

Communist propagandists already have made much of the theme that American philanthropy has strings tied to it, that it undermines the independence of nations accepting it. If we let a large number of Indians starve because their government refused to vote as we wished it in the United Nations, will not our vast humanitarian programs all over the world be grossly undermined?

What are the facts in the India controversy? Drought and locusts caused a severe food shortage and about 100,000,000 people, now depending on rationed food, are already down to nine ounces of rice or wheat a day. The Indian Government needs about 6,000,000 tons of grain from the outside. Two-thirds of this is being purchased. The United States is asked to furnish the remaining 2,000,000 tons. Nehru offered to pay for it on easy terms, but the State Department thinks that the Indian Government cannot afford to go into debt for the amount.

We have the grain. Our warehouses are bursting with surplus wheat which, if not moved to foreign markets, will grow stale. We have the necessary ships to move it, though some may have to be taken out of moth balls.

Questions arise as to why the State Department presented the Indian request to the Senate at a time when emotions were high over the Korean war and India's sensitiveness to the cause of Communist China. State Department officials are supposed to take the long view in such matters. Did they deliberately plan a slap at the Nehru government?

Another question: India's Moslem neighbor, Pakistan, reportedly has 600,000 tons of grain surplus which could be purchased. By refusing to use Pakistan grain, Mr. Nehru gives the impression he would rather let Hindus starve than to bolster Pakistan's economy by resuming normal trade relations. This should be looked into as well as reports of rice surpluses in Burma.

The strategic position of India with respect to the rest of Asia must not be overlooked in our realistic study. Nor should we fail to consider the Soviet policy of capitalizing on human misery and discontent. By refusing to assist the starving Indians, are we not putting ourselves in the category of the people we oppose?

By sending the needed wheat to India the United States could demonstrate to the world that we do not buy the consciences of other peoples. "If ever there was a chance to justify our friends and to confound our enemies," says Walter Lippmann, "it is here and now—by rising above all the petty feelings of the moment in order to play that part in the world which, when we are at our best, we find it a joy and a pride to be able to play."

A WORK OF MERCY FOR UNITED STATES: FEEDING INDIA'S HUNGRY

The sending of relief to the hungry people of India, which President Truman requested of Congress yesterday, is strictly in accord with this Nation's traditional readiness to help the needy and distressed, wherever they are.

Congress is asked to authorize the shipment of 2,000,000 tons of grain to India and to make an initial appropriation, estimated at $100,000,000, for half that amount. Prompt action must be taken if lives are to be saved. Food deliveries have to begin by April 1 if they are to reach India in time to meet the emergency.

There has been understandable opposition in Congress to this project because of the stand India has taken in the United Nations, in upholding Red China's cause, and because of Prime Minister Nehru's repeated attacks upon the United States.

For the head of a government that is looking to ours to keep its people from starving, Nehru has been acting in a strange fashion.

His meekness toward Communist China, and his refusal to label that regime as an aggressor in Korea, contrast sharply with his policies elsewhere: in Kashmir, for instance. He has been demanding that the United Nations brand Pakistan as the aggressor in Kashmir and has already imposed Indian sanctions against the Moslem state. His pacific tone in relation to Peiping is contrary to his belligerent attitude at home.

Some Congressmen naturally resent this behavior and wonder why the United States should take insults from Nehru and still spend millions to feed Nehru's countrymen.

But we cannot punish innocent persons because of their rulers' conduct. Most of India's teeming millions haven't the remotest idea of what Nehru has been talking about or what political issues are involved. All they know is their families are starving.

They ask us for help, and we are not the ones to turn aside from their pleas. Feeding India is another work of mercy in which Americans will be glad to join.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal of February 9, 1951]

MR. HOOVER SPEAKS TO UPHOLD OUR ROLE

When ex-President Herbert Hoover spoke out for sending United States wheat to India to fight a famine, he cut the ground from under most of the congressional opposition. His agreement to act as an adviser to the administration on transportation and food resources in this emergency goes a long way toward restoring aid to India to its true perspective.

Mr. Hoover's work in European famine relief after World War I is a matter of history. So is his conservatism with regard to international involvement of the United States. It is impossible, then, for the most intense of his fellow Republicans to accuse him of advocating either waste or coddling a nation which is too soft toward the Soviet Union.

It was on the latter rather distorted argument, of course, that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee sidetracked India's request for help. India's Prime Minister Nehru and UN Delegate Sir Benegal Rau had opposed the United States resolution under which the United Nations formally affixed on Red China the charge of aggression in Korea. We disagreed at the time, believing China's aggression to be obvious. At the same time we felt that Mr. Nehru and Sir Benegal were earnest in their efforts to arrange a cease-fire, despite the fact that the proposals they were able to tender from China were specious.

The important point is that the United States has presented itself in the role of a protector of the oppressed and a champion of free opinion. If we had penalized India because we disliked what her representatives were proposing, why, then, we would have proved ourselves both an enemy of the oppressed and of free opinion as well—if it differed from our own.

As Mr. Hoover remarked, "The United States has never in its history failed to be helpful to a famine-stricken people." Of all times in history, this one is not the occasion to begin failing. Our granaries are bulging. Millions in India are hungry, and more face starvation because of crop failures. One may shrug and say India has always had famines and always will have; but he will be party to an exceedingly foolish attitude. As a free commonwealth, India faces a new day. Whether it will be a day of slavery or of emergence into the light of real advancement depends on the continued grimness of the free nations against Communist imperialism.

India is buying millions of tons of wheat from this country. Whether it is necessary for us to give 2,000,000 more tons or to advance them through long-term credit to avert real famine, the wise course is clear. Let us declare our intention and prove it with action without delay.

[From the San Francisco Chronicle of February 9, 1951]

HOOVER AND INDIA

The prestige lent by Herbert Hoover to the project of providing food to the famine-stricken areas of India should weigh heavily with Congress.

As Mr. Hoover says, this kind of relief has always been humanitarian, not political, and should remain so.

Each Congressman has the right to agree or disagree with the international policies of Prime Minister Nehru and the Indian Government; but to try, as have some Congressmen, to use food shipments as a lever to move Indian policy into line with the views of Congress is worse than useless.

It would not, in the first place, have the desired effect. That kind of pressure notoriously arouses intense resentment. India's hungry millions would hardly establish a connection between the food we were denying them and the behavior of their government in matters of which they were only vaguely aware. And India's governmental functionaries are not the ones who are starving.

On the other hand, the indignation resulting from such an action would not be confined to Indians; people all over the world would resent this kind of callous squeeze play.

Whatever America provides should be provided without any political strings whatever—provided, as Mr. Hoover says, in consonance with our fundamental Christian faith and our traditions.

TERMS OF OFFICE OF MEMBERS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to prescribe terms of office for members of the Civil Service Commission, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me explaining the purposes of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 877) to prescribe terms of office for members of the Civil Service Commission, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The statement presented by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSTON OF SOUTH CAROLINA

I am today introducing a bill to place the three members of the Civil Service Commission on a term basis of 6 years each. My bill proposes that the terms of the members be rotated, to provide original appointments of 2, 4, and 6 years each, and to begin as of March 1, 1951.

The three members of the Civil Service Commission now serve at the pleasure of the President—one of the few agencies where this situation has continued to exist. Under such a system, where the members serve for extended periods, the Senate is provided with only infrequent opportunities to examine the records and qualifications of those who direct our civil-service system.

I need not remind my colleagues that my bill would follow the policy laid down by the Congress in recent years in adjusting the terms of other members of Federal commissions and boards. We have enacted laws that stagger the terms of the Atomic Energy Commissioners, the members of the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as well as those of other agencies.

I am sure we all agree that a rotating system of commission and board members is both sound and in the interest of good government. Such a system would insure the continuity of experienced people to guide our Government agencies.

It is my opinion that my bill would strengthen the bipartisan nature of the Civil Service Commission as it would attract highly qualified persons in the field of personnel to the Commission. May I emphasize that my bill does not disturb the present bipartisan Commission. The Commission membership would continue on its present basis: Two members of the majority party, one member of the minority.

My bill provides that the present membership on the Civil Service Commission would serve until successors have been appointed and qualified, but not to exceed 60 days following enactment of my bill.

May I point out that my bill recognizes the basic policy expressed in the original Civil Service Act of 1883—to provide equal opportunity for consideration and appointment to civil-service positions for all citizens of our great Nation.

I shall refer this bill to the special subcommittee set up within the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee to make a study of civil-service and Government manpower policies generally. A major objective of that subcommittee will be to draft legislation to strengthen the Civil Service Commission.

I urge the support of my colleagues for this worthy measure.

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution providing for the direct election of President and Vice President by the people and for primaries. It is the same as the joint resolution introduced by me in the Eightieth and the Eighty-first Congresses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to terms of office of President, and providing for nomination of candidates for President and Vice President, and for election of such candidates, by popular vote, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTINUATION OF OPERATIONS UNDER CERTAIN MINERAL LEASES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. MURRAY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) to provide for the continuation of operations under certain mineral leases issued by the respective States covering submerged lands of the Continental Shelf, to encourage the continued development of such leases, to provide for the protection of the interests of the United States in the oil and gas deposits of said lands, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WHERE AMERICA STANDS TODAY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR McFARLAND

[Mr. HOEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Where America Stands Today," delivered by Senator McFARLAND at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner at Raleigh, N. C., on February 10, 1951, which appears in the Appendix.]

LINCOLN DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR WILEY BEFORE MONTGOMERY COUNTY REPUBLICANS

[Mr. WILEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by him at the Manor Club on Monday, February 12, 1951, before the Montgomery County Republicans, which appears in the Appendix.]

LINCOLN DAY ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR DEWEY

TO RESIST COMMUNISM—LETTER BY JOSIAH E. DUBOIS, JR.

[Mr. HENDRICKSON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by Josiah E. Dubois, Jr., to the editor of the New York Times and published in that newspaper on January 23 under the caption "To resist communism," which appears in the Appendix.]

GROWING OF GUAYULE IN THE UNITED STATES — STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSON OF TEXAS

[Mr. JOHNSON of Texas asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by him regarding the growing of guayule in the United States, which appears in the Appendix.]

FORUM OF PUBLIC OPINION AT SUNRAY, TEX.

[Mr. JOHNSON of Texas asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. W. E. Simpson, chairman of a public forum meeting held at Sunray, Tex., and an accompanying statement of the consensus of local opinion on a number of vital issues, which appear in the Appendix.]

THE DEFENSE CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM IN ALASKA—STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSON OF TEXAS

[Mr. JOHNSON of Texas asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by him relating to the defense construction program in Alaska, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE MILITARY MANPOWER PROGRAM—EDITORIAL COMMENT

[Mr. JOHNSON of Texas asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a number of editorials from leading newspapers regarding the manpower hearings and bills, which appear in the Appendix.]

WHY NOT A NATIONAL HOLIDAY TO HONOR F. D. R.?—EDITORIAL FROM THE MACHINIST

[Mr. LEHMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Why Not A National Holiday To Honor F. D. R.?" published in the January 25, 1951, issue of the Machinist, organ of the International Association of Machinists, which appears in the Appendix.]

PRINCIPLES OF STUDENTS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

[Mr. LEHMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article written by Richard A. Givens and published in the March 1951 issue of the Newsletter of the Students for Democratic Action of New York State, which appears in the Appendix.]

ENLISTMENT OF 18-YEAR-OLD BOYS—STATEMENT BY CLINTON N. HOWARD

[Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement entitled "Shall We Enlist 18-Year-Old Boys," made by the editor of Progress, official publication of the International Reform Federation, before the Armed Services Committee of the Senate on January 31, 1951, and published in the February 1951 issue of Progress, which appears in the Appendix.]

AGED AND DISABLED RETIRED ENLISTED MEN—LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT BY JOHN H. HOEPPEL

[Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter dated February 6, 1951, written to the President by John H. Hoeppel, founder, National Defense magazine, pleading for greater consideration for aged and disabled retired enlisted men, which appears in the Appendix.]

A DEMOCRATIC FOREIGN POLICY—ADDRESS BY MICHAEL STRAIGHT

[Mr. MURRAY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "A Democratic Foreign Policy," delivered by Michael Straight, editor of the New Republic, at Pittsburgh, Pa., January 25, 1951, at the annual Roosevelt Day dinner sponsored by the Pittsburgh chapter of the Americans for Democratic Action, which appears in the Appendix.]

LABELING OF FURS—LETTER FROM ASSOCIATED FUR INDUSTRIES OF MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in connection with the fur labeling bill now pending before the Senate, having been reported on February 5 by the Interstate Commerce Committee, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD the text of a letter which I have received this morning from Robert Kottke, president of the Associated Fur Industries of Milwaukee. I believe that my colleagues will be interested in Mr. Kottke's views.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSOCIATED FUR INDUSTRIES OF MILWAUKEE,
Milwaukee, Wis., February 12, 1951.

Hon. Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As president of the Associated Fur Industries of Milwaukee and Wisconsin, representing a large group of Wisconsin retailers, I must urge you to consider the evils of the labeling bill now before the Senate for consideration. Our industry has suffered acutely since 1943, first from the excise tax, next from the public bickerings, promises, and retraction regarding the lowering of such tax.

This labeling bill would deal our industry another hard blow. We have always suffered from the unfair practice of manufacturers and jobbers selling directly to the public. Not removing their labels would result in the public going directly to the manufacturers. It would also mean that we would hand over to our competitors knowledge that we have been a lifetime accumulating, knowledge that oftentimes spells the difference between success and failure.

Take away from a man his experience and sagacity in choosing the best sources for any given fur and what has he left to offer his customers? Take from him his own label in coats coming from his store and you have reduced him from an individual with a reputation to a nonentity. Shall we of Wisconsin just hand over the fur business to wholesalers and jobbers?

Check the steadily falling revenue from the fur excise tax as a true criterion of the state our industry is now in. I can assure you we cannot stand further hardships.

This labeling would not give a customer any idea of quality in any given fur. Therefore I am unable to see where any benefit would result.

We urge you to amend the bill so that the individual furrier could substitute his own label for that of the manufacturer or jobber and thus retain his identity.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT E. KOTTKE,
President.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

FREE IMPORTATION OF GIFTS FROM MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES ON DUTY ABROAD

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 2141.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 2141) to extend for 2 years the existing privilege of free importation of gifts from members of the Armed Forces of the United States on duty abroad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this is existing law. The bill merely extends the privilege to our soldiers abroad for a period of 2 years. It was unanimously reported by the Senate Finance Committee, and I believe there is no objection to it.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Is not this the same provision which we had all through World War II?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. This is a mere extension for 2 years.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I thank the Senator. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 2141) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXAMINATION OF RECORDS AND OBTAINING OF DOCUMENTS BY JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 87, which is a noncontroversial measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 87) amending section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall make a brief statement in connection with the joint resolution. All the joint resolution does is to give to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation the privilege of examining records and obtaining documents from the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the same privilege which the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation had prior to the Congressional Reorganization Act. That act casts some doubt upon the right of the joint committee to obtain necessary documents and information from the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This joint resolution was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, and was unanimously recommended. I ask for its approval.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 87) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEMNITY PAYMENTS TO SURVIVORS OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES WHO DIE IN ACTIVE SERVICE

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I had intended to call up House bill 1, to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who died in active service, and for other purposes, but certain amendments have been sent to the desk which are proposed to be offered, and I believe it will be necessary for the bill to go over. In no event, I think, could we dispose of it today.

If there are other amendments to be submitted to House bill 1, I hope Senators will avail themselves of the opportunity to have the amendments printed so that we have them before us on Monday.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments to House bill 1, and ask unanimous consent that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the Senators from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE and Mr. NEELY], I send to the desk two amendments to House bill 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. GEORGE. In view of the amendments offered by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] which I have not yet had an opportunity to examine, as well as the amendments offered just now by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] which I presume inject certain controversial features into the bill, I think it would be wise not to call up the bill now, but rather to have it go over until Monday or such other time as we may be able to obtain consideration of it.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I shall be very glad to send copies of my amendments to the office of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his consideration in suggesting that the bill be put over until Monday or some other time when the matters in controversy can be carefully considered and acted upon.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator. I shall be pleased to have the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any other business to come before the Senate?

RENEGOTIATION ACT OF 1951

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the only other matter from the Finance Committee which, under a rather tentative understanding with the majority leader I might seek to call up today, is the Renegotiation Act of 1951, House bill 1724. I should like to have that bill made the unfinished business. I do not believe it can be disposed of today in view of the absence of a quorum from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1724) to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consideration of the bill (H. R. 1724) and thereby make it the unfinished business. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1724) to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the Senate would be wise to permit this bill to go over until Monday. It is a very important bill. It ought to be acted upon, and no doubt we can act upon it Monday, unless the majority leader should have some other more pressing business that he desires the Senate to consider first. In that event, I would be glad to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator intend to follow action on H. R. 1724 with House bill 1?

Mr. GEORGE. I have already mentioned that bill. I have not asked that it be taken up, but I expect to bring it up on Monday.

Mr. TAFT. After action has been had on the bill to provide for renegotiation of contracts?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. I have asked Senators to offer any amendments to the bill they may have in mind to offer. Certain amendments have been offered by two Senators, the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER]. Those amendments result in certain controversial features in connection with H. R. 1, so I do not think we can dispose of the bill in the absence of a quorum of the Senate.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, February 19, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, grant that in this moment of sacred communion with Thy spirit we may have an inspiring and uplifting sense of Thy greatness and goodness.

Help us to believe more sincerely and confidently in the efficacy of prayer, not as a power to take away our perplexing problems and difficulties, our trials and tribulations, but as a power girding our minds and hearts to meet them courageously and victoriously.

We humbly confess that when we forget Thee and lose sight of Thee, then we become anxious and are haunted with fears which rob us of all peace. We pray that Thou wilt enlarge and strengthen our faith in Thee and in the ultimate triumph of the true, the good, and the right.

May we continue to pray and labor for that blessed time when all the destructive and diabolical motives of hatred and selfishness which fill the hearts of men shall be supplanted by the nobler feelings of kindness and compassion and an eagerness to bear one another's burdens.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FIFTY-CENT DOLLARS STARVE AMERICA'S AGED

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, 50-cent dollars are starving America's aged who should have first priority. Their meager incomes are static but food and the other necessities of life have skyrocketed in price until their real income is reduced one-half and many are now on a starvation basis in a land of plenty. To meet this problem I have today introduced a bill, H. R. 2678, embodying the Townsend social-security plan. My colleague the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELATNIK], is introducing an identical companion bill.

At a meeting with the Townsend executive committee, whose members are JOHN A. BLATNIK; RAY MADDEN, of Indiana; GARDNER D. WITHROW, of Wisconsin; J. HARRY MCGREGOR, of Ohio; ROBERT C. SECREST, of Ohio; EDWIN A. HALL, of New York; and myself, it was expressed as the opinion of the committee that the same bill be introduced in the Eighty-second Congress as was introduced in the Eighty-first Congress inasmuch as it so clearly deals with the needs of our aged citizens.

The bills we have introduced today with one minor exception are the same as those introduced by us in the Eighty-first Congress, H. R. 2135 and H. R. 2136. As set forth in the heading, the purpose of this legislation is to provide every adult citizen in the United States with equal basic Federal insurance, permitting retirement with benefits at age 60, and also covering total disability, from whatever cause, for certain citizens under 60; to give protection to widows with children; to provide an ever-expanding market for goods and services through the payment and distribution of such benefits in ratio to the Nation's steadily increasing ability to produce, with the cost of such benefits to be carried by every citizen in proportion to the income privileges he enjoys.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there was never a more propitious time to enact this legislation. With the spiral of inflation confronting us and with the cost of food and other necessities of life at an all-time high, the elderly citizens of America are finding it impossible to meet the minimum costs to keep body and soul together. Not only food prices but shelter, medical attention, and every essential of living have skyrocketed beyond the ability of this low-income group to meet.

This legislation, if enacted, will solve this problem. It will be Nation-wide in its coverage, will afford modest but necessary income for the aged and at the same time will not unduly disturb our national economy. It will provide purchasing power for this large group of our citizens to secure the necessities of life and to that extent will tend to stabilize markets. When this problem is considered on an over-all basis and all forms of assistance and relief to the old people of the Nation are considered in toto it will be found that this method of meeting the problem, provided in the legislation we have introduced, will not be a greater drain on the resources of the Nation than the multitudinous overlapping programs already existing seeking to meet the problem.

I most respectfully urge all of my colleagues to give serious and immediate attention to this important legislation. It should have been enacted into law long before this in order to prevent unnecessary hardship to this great group of deserving citizens.

OLD-AGE-PENSION PROGRAM

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, today I have the honor and pleasure of joining with my very good friend the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL] to introduce once again the Townsend pension bill (H. R. 2679) to provide real economic security for the old folks of America. The decision to reintroduce this pension bill was made last week at the meeting of the Townsend executive committee, the membership of which includes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ANGELL], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW], the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. MCGREGOR and Mr. SECREST], the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL], and myself.

This bill which I have the privilege of sponsoring once again is identical—with one minor exception—to the Townsend bills (H. R. 2135, 2136) which were introduced in the Eighty-first Congress. Our reasons for reintroducing this bill are obvious to anyone who is familiar with the problems confronting the aged of our country. The facts show that the present social-security program is wholly inadequate, both in coverage and monthly benefits, to give security to our senior citizens many of whom today are living in poverty and want.

The facts also show that the only solution to their problem is the enactment by Congress of a comprehensive and liberal old-age-pension program. The bill which I am offering to Congress today embraces such a program, and it is my sincere hope that Congress will meet its obligations to the fathers and mothers of America by enacting this bill into law without further delay.

MONETARY POLICIES

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, it is my responsibility to fight the battle against inflation on all fronts. This feeling that a better job must be done immediately is certainly shared by every housewife who finds her household costs still rising and by every worker who finds his wages frozen while his cost of living is being rapidly thawed out.

At the moment, the hue and cry of conflict centers around the familiar catch phrases of price control, wage stabilization, allocation, rationing. Even the mushrooming new agencies that sprout overnight out of the well-fertilized ground of bureaucracy come up with a new sequence of alphabet letters, but all doing the same job as before.

Whatever the combination of letters, unless they are backed by proper monetary policies, they all spell trouble for the housewife, the wage earner, the small-business man, the person living on a pension.

Still hidden behind the glare of exploding flash bulbs, and exploded economic theories, a battle goes on which has thus far escaped the general public eye and understanding. I refer to the battle between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury Department.

Upon the outcome of this battle hinges the success or failure of our entire effort to really do something about inflation. Here we come face to face with a problem which will require greater insight and more real courage than any yet displayed on the more popular and more easily understood other inflationary fronts.

The Open Market Committee of the Federal Reserve has for a long time been supporting the market for Government bonds to help maintain their low interest rates. This committee has bought billions of dollars of marketable bonds and has placed the cash into general circulation. This cash has become a part of our general demand deposits in the banks. The bonds are used by them as a basis for further credit.

Many people are quick to say that Government spending alone is responsible for the present inflationary crisis. I recognize that the total cost of Government must go up in any time of emergency. However, I believe that the cheap-money policy of the Treasury Department is a more important factor in causing our present inflation than is Government spending.

This cheap-money policy which in fact has allowed an expansion of bank loans to the extent of more than ten billions of dollars in recent months is the keystone holding up the inflation arch.

Since President Truman ordered our troops into Korea in June of 1950, the rise in price inflation—the cost of the things you and I must buy in order that we may live—has paralleled the inflation of our currency or the cheapening of our dollar.

How can anyone talk about too much money in circulation? Do you know anyone who ever has enough money to circulate? Every housewife in America finds her pocketbook empty by the time she has paid the week's bills. Many find theirs empty even before the bills needed to keep the family together are paid.

Possibly we can understand better what is happening if we recall our recent history.

Ten years ago—just before the start of World War II—all of us as loyal, patriotic Americans bought series E war bonds. Many of us bought these bonds to lay away money for the education of our children, to help provide care for ourselves should we be unable to work as we grew older.

Now, as we prepare for world war III, the first of these World War II bonds are about to mature. Those bond holders who so desperately need the money now to pay current expenses will find when they cash in these bonds that every dollar put away 10 years ago now can buy only 60 cents worth of things—if the things still are available.

This is what is meant by cheap money. Every bond holder or potential bond buyer wonders if the dollar has cheapened from 100 cents to 60 cents during the past 10 years what will happen to it at the end of the next 10 years.

Unless this policy stops, wages will never be high enough to cover the legitimate needs of a wage earner's family, a life-insurance policy will not give adequate protection; the much-needed and well-deserved pension just will not be enough.

The administration must decide whether it is proinflation or antiinflation. In my opinion, it is dishonest to suggest an antiinflationary tax policy on the one hand while at the same time insisting on a proinflationary interest policy on the other.

President Truman has sent a tax proposal to the Congress suggesting that our tax bill—your taxes and my taxes—be increased $10,000,000,000. This taking of an additional $10,000,000,000 of your money is urged on the basis that it is antiinflationary. If such is the case, then you have a right to insist that the same interest and bond-buying policy by which the Federal Reserve System has increased our money supply in recent months by nearly the same $10,000,000,000 be stopped immediately.

This is not a partisan political battle. The American people who today are being asked to do so much and to make so many real sacrifices have the right to demand from the present administration that it resolve immediately the very real crisis developing from the intramural battle being waged between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury. The time is now.

HELP FOR THOSE SUBJECT TO MILITARY CALL

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a copy of a bill I am introducing today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill that would help those subject to military call to secure employment or promotion in their present employment. This proposal, if enacted into law, would go a long way toward overcoming the handicap the armed services reservists, members of the National Guard, and those subject to selective service now face as they endeavor to secure employment or regular promotion in their present employment.

This measure amends the Internal Revenue Code to provide an incentive for employers to employ individuals subject to military call. The bill provides an additional deduction by way of a business expense for part of the remuneration paid to such employee.

No doubt many Members have received letters, just as I have, calling attention to the fact that employers are naturally hesitant to consider employing anyone subject to and likely to be called into the armed services. It seems to me that there probably are not many employers who take this attitude. However, there are apparently enough to make a rather serious situation which is causing general alarm among members of the National Guard, reservists, and those subject to selective service. I am confident that there is not any employer who does not personally wish he could take on employees who might be called into the service. However, the employer is faced with a hard problem, and it is understandable that this situation annoys him as much as it does the employee who is likely to be called into the service.

It seems to me that the National Defense Establishment should make every effort, insofar as it is possible, to overcome the uncertainty which results in this situation.

I believe that the proposal I have introduced today will go a long way in helping to solve this problem. I believe further that it will help our over-all effort to secure the maximum utilization of our manpower and productive facilities.

This measure will in all probability be referred to the House Ways and Means Committee, but I want to call it to the specific attention of the House Armed Services Committee because I believe it is a problem to which both committees must direct careful consideration and some action to relieve the unfortunate uncertainties, handicap, and discrimination which have naturally come about as a result of our national defense manpower mobilization policies.

I submit here along with my remarks a copy of the bill and request that it may be printed in the RECORD:

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code to provide an incentive for employers to employ individuals liable for induction or call to active duty in the Armed Forces of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That section 23 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to deductions from gross income) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(cc) Special deduction in respect of employees entering Armed Forces:

"(1) In general: If during the taxable year any individual left a position (other than a temporary position) in the employ of the taxpayer—

LITHUANIA

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the thirty-third anniversary of the independence of Lithuania. Under the domination of Communist Russia, there still exists the yearning of centuries for freedom. To be a free people has been the age-old aspiration of the Lithuanians. For a few years, between the two World Wars, liberty was enjoyed and cherished. Then came the Soviet occupation and with it came the loss of freedom and misery to the people of Lithuania.

Several hundred thousands paid the price of loss of their lives. Victims were tortured; suffered from planned starvation, and finally were exiled to prison or slave labor camps. Husbands were separated from their wives and children; sent to different Siberian camps; and the children reared in complete contradiction to their cultural and religious backgrounds.

Behind the iron curtain, Lithuania cannot publicly proclaim its constant yearning for liberty. Soviet oppression has taken care of that. But the people in that unfortunate country keep on praying for the day of deliverance. They maintain an heroic underground capable of spreading intelligent American truth.

Here in America, the Lithuanians keep alive the spirit of their national aspirations.

May these aspirations some day become a reality.

That is the universal hope of Americans who believe in freedom and in the independence of nations to govern themselves.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a resolution and a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the thirty-third anniversary of the national independence of Lithuania.

We find, however, that instead of enjoying that independence which was earned through great sacrifice, this brave, liberty-loving people are struggling in the throes of oppression and aggression.

It is high time that this Nation take a firm stand in defense of a people who have by force of arms lost that freedom for which we have pledged support. I urge the Congress and the Department of State to take appropriate action to bring to an end this reign of terror and oppression.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of Lithuanian-Americans of Rockford, Ill., and my reply to these splendid people:

RESOLUTION UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED AT A MASS MEETING OF THE LITHUANIAN-AMERICANS IN ROCKFORD, ILL., HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE LOCAL BRANCH OF THE LITHUANIAN AMERICAN COUNCIL, INC., ON THE 11TH DAY OF FEBRUARY 1951, TO COMMEMORATE THE THIRTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE OF LITHUANIA

Whereas Lithuania, the land of our ancestors, has been and still is unlawfully occupied by the Soviet military and police forces; and

Whereas, after having usurped the sovereign and inalienable rights of the Lithuanian people, the Soviet rulers are applying ever harsher methods of oppression and outright extermination of the indigenous population of that country by mass deportation, imprisonment, and execution; and

Whereas the Lithuanian people are strongly opposed to alien domination and are determined to regain their freedom and sovereignty; and

Whereas because of their manifest and unmistakable anti-Communist attitude, the Lithuanian people, backed by their kinsmen in this country, represent a reliable link in the defense chain which is presently being forged by the free nations against the Communist aggression: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, Americans of Lithuanian origin or descent, in joining our countrymen in the grief caused by the acts of aggression and injustice of the Soviet Union, voice an emphatic protest against the terroristic activities of the Soviets in Lithuania and especially against the crime of genocide being perpetrated by the Soviet Government, and pledge all possible support to the efforts of the Lithuanian people to reestablish their independent and democratic republic; be it further

Resolved, That we appeal to the Government of the United States with the request to include the liberation of Lithuania and other countries enslaved by Soviet Russia into the program of the American foreign policy and to use a proper occasion for a public restatement of the views of the Government on the necessity to restore the independence of these countries; be it finally

Resolved, That we, Lithuanian-Americans, reaffirming our loyalty to the principles of American democracy, pledge our wholehearted support of the administration in its efforts to resist the Communist forces of aggression and achieve an international peace founded on principles of freedom and justice.

STEVE KELIOTIS,
Chairman.
PAUL A. DELTUVA,
Secretary.

ROCKFORD, ILL., February 11, 1951.

FEBRUARY 14, 1951.

PAUL A. DELTUVA,
Secretary, Rockford Branch,
Lithuanian-American Council, Inc.,
Rockford, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. DELTUVA: I acknowledge receipt of the resolution adopted at the mass meeting of Lithuanian-Americans on February 11 with respect to the direful situation confronting the people of your homeland.

The contents of this resolution, setting forth in convincing detail the brutal aggression practiced upon your people, strike in me a responsive chord for I have long been interested in the devotion to freedom and abhorrence of injustice that through these many years has so outstandingly characterized the people of Lithuania.

I can understand how the injustices being presently imposed on your homeland by brute force bear more heavily on your hearts at this anniversary of national independence for, while you good people here enjoy as American citizens the freedoms denied to those yet in Lithuania, you would be less than human did you not do everything in your power to alleviate the deplorable conditions surrounding them and affecting their very existence.

Your resolution but intensifies my earnest desire to be helpful in every possible way. To this end I can assure you and those sponsoring this resolution that I shall press earnestly and persistently for a clear-cut statement of policy by our Department of State in harmony with the objectives so forcefully set out in your resolution and, further, shall urge affirmative action by the State Department to make such policy statement effective.

Sincerely yours,

LEO E. ALLEN,
Member of Congress.

IN HONOR OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, Lithuania was one of the first victims of the last World War. In June 1940 it was occupied by Soviet Union forces. In July 1941, Nazi troops expelled the Red army and ruled over the country until August 1944, when the Russians came back and incorporated Lithuania into the Soviet Union. And since Moscow did not succeed in changing the Lithuanians into Bolsheviks, thousands of them were killed, expelled, deported. All the progress made in two decades of independence in every phase of life—economic, financial, commercial, educational—was destroyed by the teachers of a new way of felicity—communism.

American-Lithuanians, so much more fortunate than their brothers who live under Communist terror, are aware of Lithuania's tragedy. They know that today the members of the Lithuanian underground movement, risking their lives to fight the Russians in Lithuania, are in the same camp as American boys trying to hold back Communist aggression in Korea. Their fight is the fight of all free nations for freedom and democracy.

On this anniversary of Lithuanian independence, we think of all these thousands of people who died for their country, and we look forward to seeing again a free and prosperous Lithuania.

FOOD FOR INDIA

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, today a group of us from the Committee on Foreign Affairs is introducing a bill to start action toward getting relief in the form of surplus wheat to more than 10,000,000 people in India who otherwise are likely to starve in the next few months due to famine resulting from earthquake, floods, and drought. No one has been more opposed than I to what I believe to be the unrealistic and unwise attitude of the Indian Government on the question of Communist aggression in Asia, which, unless checked in Korea and China, will, I fear, conquer India too. But our differences with the Indian Government on policy have no relation to American concern for the suffering of the starving Indian people. I believe we should make available within the reasonable limits of our capacities such wheat as full investigation makes clear India does not have the ability to purchase.

We should do it, first, because they are human beings in need; and secondly, because these particular human beings happen to live in a very vital spot in today's world. Communism makes headway by promising people whatever it is they need. Although it never yet has delivered on the big promises, you cannot blame needy people for following the false guides if they see nowhere else to turn. Our American way is not promises, but performance. This is a case where what our hearts prompt us to do coincides with what our heads tell us is in our own long-term interest and in the interest of peace and world security.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

THE COTTON SITUATION

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, during the last war in conference with the Quartermaster General and other high officials, I was told that cotton ranked third in the importance of war materials. First comes explosives; then the various kinds of metals, and then cotton. In that connection I have just received a resolution passed yesterday by the general assembly of my State, which reads as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE PRESIDENT AND UNITED STATES OFFICIALS TO REMOVE THE ORDER FROM THE OFFICE OF PRICE STABILIZATION AFFECTING COTTON ISSUED JANUARY 25, 1951

Whereas cotton is one of the basic industries of this Nation; and

Whereas cotton has long been the basis of South Carolina's economic life and the growing and processing reaches into every phase of the life of the citizens of South Carolina and the Nation; and

Whereas the United States of America is in a critical period and cotton is essential to the national defense effort; and

Whereas at the present time cotton is in temporary short supply and the cotton farmers and producers of South Carolina and the Nation have been asked to produce more than 16,000,000 bales of cotton as part of the national defense effort which is a 60-percent increase in production; and

Whereas due to the recent Federal regulations, as contained in the order from the Office of Price Stabilization issued January 25, 1951, free trade and free flow of this commodity is at a compete standstill and conditions have become chaotic adversely affecting the farmers, cotton merchants, manufacturers, ginners, warehousemen, bankers, transportation systems and directly, or indirectly, all phases of normal business: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the President of the United States and the proper governmental agencies, including the United States Department of Agriculture and the Office of Price Stablization, are requested to immediately remove the present unworkable order pertaining to cotton in order to permit the resumption of normal distribution and processing of raw cotton; to assure the cotton farmer that the 16,000,000 bales he has been asked to produce by our Government will move readily as in the past; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the senate immediately transmit copies of the resolution to the President of the United States; the United States Secretary of Agriculture, Charles S. Brannan; the Administrator of the Office of Price Stablization, Michael DiSalle; and to the South Carolina Members of Congress.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have this date introduced a new old-age pension bill, which is similar to the one I introduced in the Eighty-first Congress. Substantially, the only change in the bill is that the amount has been increased from $60 per month to $100 per month.

This change in the amount was made after consultations with a number of Members of the House of Representatives and with many people interested in a good old-age pension program, including the American Pension Committee, Inc., and the General Welfare Federation, Inc. It seems to be the consensus of opinion of those who are most interested and most familiar with this proposed legislation that by reason of the present high cost of living and by reason of the fact that even under the present old-age assistance program some States are paying now amounts near this sum—the State of Colorado, as I understand it, is now paying, under the old-age assistance program, to those qualified for assistance on some occasions the sum of $90 per month and probably an average of $75 or $80 per month—that this raised amount is more nearly in keeping with what would be a just and fair pension allowance at the present time.

We who are interested in this program fully realize that this is a time of peril for our great country, and fully realize also that the welfare of our armed services, including, of course, our heroic troops in Korea and the protection of our beloved country from its enemies, should be our first and primary concern at this time. However, we also feel that one of the things for which our boys are fighting and dying is the welfare of their fathers and mothers and homes. We feel that we would be derelict in our duty if we should fail, on our part, to give all security possible to their loved ones for whom they are making such tremendous sacrifices.

It was my personal experience to fight in a number of the bloodiest battles in World War I, and I believe that I am in a position to know, first-hand, just what is in the mind of the combat soldier on the battlefield, and I believe that I know what he thinks primarily of the welfare of his country and of his father and mother, and his loved ones generally.

I am sure that a great many are familiar with the bill we introduced last Congress, but in order to inform those who might not be acquainted with it, and for the RECORD, I wish to state that in substance the bill provides for a direct, Federal old-age pension, at the rate of $100 per month to all qualified individuals. A person would be a qualified individual who is 60 years of age or over, and is a citizen of the United States, providing his gross income is less than the minimum amount with respect to which a Federal income-tax return is required to be filed.

We wish to do all that we can to further the progress of this bill and hope that the proper committee to which it will be referred will give us hearings on it, in the reasonably near future, and that same will be reported out for consideration of the House some time during this session of Congress.

We believe that this bill, or legislation similar thereto, is necessary if justice is to be accorded to our elder citizens who are most in need of a program of this kind. We do not find fault with those groups who now have adequate pension and retirement programs, but we are most anxious that those who do not have such adequate pensions and retirement benefits, be accorded same.

WHEAT FOR INDIA

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I am interested in the resolution which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] has introduced relative to giving wheat to India. I hope when the hearings are held before the Foreign Affairs Committee that that committee will make every effort to determine whether or not the Prime Minister of India has been playing power politics with Pakistan, and whether or not he has made every effort to treat Pakistan in the same way that he suggests we treat Communist China.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Yes, I yield.

Mr. JUDD. I think I stated in my remarks that I favored giving only such aid as investigation demonstrates is beyond the capacity of the Indian Government to procure for its people.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. I appreciate that, and I am sure the gentleman means that. I hope the investigation will be exhaustive enough to bring out some of these things that are in the minds of many of the Members. By this, Mr. Speaker, I mean I would like to know why Mr. Nehru bitterly attacks the United States for what he calls our intervention and imperialism in Korea and at the same time has had troops on the border of Pakistan for many months and has tried to strangle that country economically. In the meantime, he has brought his own people to the verge of starvation and now asks the United States to save them from that starvation while he continues his aggression against his neighbor. Certainly, this will bear a great deal of investigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS] has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to address the House today for 10 minutes, following the legislative business and any special orders heretofore entered.

THIRTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE FOR LITHUANIA

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the thirty-third anniversary of the declaration of Lithuania as a free and independent republic.

On this date in 1918, this small Baltic nation proclaimed to the world her ability to engage in a program of self-democratic government and spiritual progress.

The modern history of Lithuania, however, as an independent nation was ruthlessly terminated by the forceful invasion and atrocious subjugation of the Republic by the overwhelming military forces of the Soviet Union.

Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia were the first of the small nations democratically erected after the First World War to feel the brunt of Soviet aggression.

Since that time most of the Slavic nations, particularly Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Albania have been joined in the horrible fate visited upon the Baltic nations. About a year ago this time, reliable reports from underground sources indicated that all phases of life were growing steadily worse in Lithuania under the relentless fury of the Soviet program of enslavement.

Significantly, the program of Communist persecution has been aimed primarily at the extinction of religion in Lithuania.

Before the Soviet conquest, the population of Lithuania was predominantly Roman Catholic. Over 80 percent of the people professed this faith with the balance being distributed among the Protestant, Jewish, and Orthodox religions.

Since June of 1940, when the Soviet Army occupied Lithuania, the Catholic clergy has been killed or transported to Siberia, monastic orders have been exterminated, parishes have been abolished, Catholic universities and seminaries have been extinguished. The religious press has been silenced, and all endowed institutions of every description under religious auspices have been confiscated.

Under a vicious, cruel, and bloody program, the moral, social, political, economic, cultural, and military life of Lithuania has been absorbed by a collective Communist regime which has been dictated by the Soviet masters in the Kremlin.

Cries from the people of Lithuania in their crucifixion have reached us feebly from behind the iron curtain.

The terrible tragedy visited upon this small nation serves as a grim reminder that the great sacrifices of two World Wars will have been hopeless offerings if Lithuania and the other Slavic nations are not rescued from the grip of Soviet imperialism.

Everlastingly to our credit, this Nation has never recognized the absorption of Lithuania and her neighboring states into the land mass of the Soviet Union.

This refusal to recognize the conquest of Lithuania serves as a continual condemnation of, and protest against, the unlawful occupation of that noble little country by Russian military might. It serves also as a continual protest against the commitment of atrocities against the people and the democratic institutions of Lithuania.

Realizing for the moment that practical steps are perhaps impossible, nevertheless this continued protest is made and reiterated on anniversaries like today's so that the people of Lithuania and Americans of Lithuanian descent may know that our Nation shall never depart from the principle of self-determination for small nations.

On behalf of the suffering people in that tiny land on the Baltic Sea, I express the fervent hope that our foreign policy will continue to include a protest against the conquest of Lithuania and that, in the near future, it may become articulate enough to include a strong demand that the Soviet Union liberate Lithuania from the strangle hold of communism so that it may once again arise as a free and independent nation on the Baltic shores.

SAVE YOUR SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced two bills today which are intended to aid in the stabilization of our monetary system, by creating additional incentives to the holders of Government bonds to retain their investments therein. There are presently outstanding in E bonds approximately $35,000,000,000 which will mature over the next 10 years. The House adopted and passed a bill which facilitates the holders of those bonds retaining their investments and continuing to receive the same rate of interest thereon. That should be sufficient inducement to the average citizen, who not only believes in thrift but who also recognizes his obligation in these trying times to contribute what he can to prevent undue inflation. Many of these people, however, will cash their bonds because of fear instilled in them by irresponsible talk about runaway inflation which will depreciate the value of their bonds the longer they hold them.

The first of the bills referred to by me provides for a waiver of income tax on the earnings on E bonds, provided they are held for an additional 10-year period. The bill does not make it mandatory that any of the bonds be held for that length of time. The option will still be with the holder to cash them in any time he may desire to do so. If he cashes them in within the second 10-year period he will simply have to pay his income tax thereon. If he holds the bonds the full 10-year period he will save the tax. In view of the fact that we must increase the tax rate in the years ahead the bill also provides that the bond holder if he must cash them in and lose the tax waiver benefits will have the choice of paying at the rate then prevailing or at the rate prevailing on the date when he could originally have cashed his bonds, giving him the advantage of whichever is the lower rate.

This should provide a real inducement to the E bond holder to continue his savings in these bonds, giving him a return higher than he can otherwise get. Financiers and economists tell us that for every dollar of currency released into the stream of trade, we actually increase the monetary supply six times. If the $35,000,000,000 of E bonds were all cashed in over the next 10 years at the rate of about three and one-half billion dollars a year, we would increase the monetary supply of the country by $21,000,000,000 a year. The taxable earnings represented by this $35,000,000,000 of E bonds will total $8,750,000,000 for the next 10 years. Assuming that none of the E bond holders had paid any income tax for any part of those earnings and estimating that the holders of those bonds will pay on income tax equal to 25 percent of those earnings during the next 10 years, the maximum tax the Government can receive out of those E bond earnings will average $218,750,000 per year. That sum is indeed small compared to the total tax receipts that we contemplate the Government must collect during each of the next 10 years. If it accomplishes the purpose of keeping out of circulation only $3,500,000,000 a year, it is money worth spending. Actually it will keep out of circulation over $21,000,000,000 during each of the next 10 years.

The second of the bills I have introduced today is intended to accomplish the same purpose with reference to government securities other than the E bonds, but in a different manner. There are some $23,000,000,000 of Government securities outstanding presently in addition to the E bonds. In order to induce the holders of those bonds to continue their investments therein for an additional 10 year period, my second bill permits the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a premium of an additional one-half of 1 percent of the face amount of the bond to the holders thereof who continue their investments therein for an additional 10-year period. In making that proposal I want it distinctly understood that I am in complete accord with the President and with the Secretary of the Treasury in their position that to increase the interest rate on Government securities at this time would be wrong and bad for all of the reasons set forth by them. I am in complete disagreement with those members of the Federal Reserve System and of its Open Market Committee who take a contrary view. To increase the interest rate on Government securities would unnecessarily increase the cost of Government and at the same time prove highly inflationary, adding that much more money periodically to the financial stream. If the bankers who are advocating a higher interest rate on Government securities were honest and frank with us they would tell us that the only reason for advocating higher interest rates on Government securities is to increase bank profits. Reardless of the motives, however, that prompt their recommendation the fact is that an unhealthy atmosphere has been created in the financial markets of the country and I believe some incentive must be created so that the holders of those $23,000,000,000 in Government securities will continue their investments therein. I believe my second bill accomplishes that by providing for the payment of a premium of one-half of 1 percent to those who continue to hold their securities for an additional 10-year period. My second bill also gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority which will strengthen the long term bond market. Long term securities other than the E bonds carry a higher rate of interest than short term securities. As presently issued, however, many Government bonds intended to be issued as long term securities with an interest rate of 2½ percent can be disposed of by the holder thereof at any time after acquisition thereof, the holder receiving interest at the fixed rate from date of purchase to date of transfer. The result is that long term securities can be traded in as short term securities at the long term rate. My bill permits the Secretary of the Treasury to stop that practice by providing that bonds which are redeemed by the Government or acquired by the Federal Reserve Bank before maturity shall be so redeemed or acquired at a lesser rate of interest depending upon the length of time the security has actually been held by the original holder. The result I am sure will be that most of the owners of these long term securities will hold them until maturity.

REREFERENCE OF BILL AMENDING CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service may be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2575) to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, so as to exempt from taxation annuities of retired employees, and that the same be rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

JOHN RANKIN, THE SCOTCHMAN, AND THE LADY'S HAT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, some friends of mine have informed me that they heard over the radio that JOHN RANKIN, a Member of Congress from Mississippi, had been seen wearing a woman's hat over in the Capitol and had passed it to other Members of the House who also put it on.

He had evidently been listening to the Voice of America, because that is about as near as they come to telling the facts.

What happened was that, not a Member of this Congress, but a Scotchman by the name of John Rankin, a member of the British Parliament, the other day, rose to speak. The Chair refused to recognize him because he did not have on a hat. He reached over and took a hat off the head of one of the lady members and proceeded to make his speech. Other members then followed suit and put on the same hat in order to gain recognition.

I just did not want the public to get me mixed up with my Scotch namesake who resorted to that method of getting himself recognized in the British Parliament.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

MEDICAL CARE OF VETERANS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusets. Mr. Speaker, letters are pouring in to Members from all over the country, I believe, regarding the kind of care the veterans are receiving as a result of the cuts in the field offices, cuts in the hospitals. I visited three hospitals, one Army hospital and two Veterans' Administration hospitals within the last week. They are very much overcrowded, not only with nervous and mental cases but also a serious situation is created when there is a shortage of beds, and a shortage of attendants. At Cushing General Hospital there were practically no attendants for the badly paralyzed men.

The Army has issued a call for some 400 doctors and they have asked for over 300 nurses. I think the time is past due when there should be a survey of the whole situation of Veterans' Administration facilities and the medical attention available to them. It is very much needed. On Monday I shall introduce the following resolution calling for such a survey. I hope it will be adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete survey of Veterans' Administration hospitals, domiciliary centers and other like facilities, including the construction, operation, and personnel administration of such facilities.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the first session of the present Congress the results of its survey, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit and act during the first session of the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings, as it deems necessary.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes today, following any special orders heretofore entered.

VETERAN VICTIMS OF OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we are all in full accord with the statement of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] that we must look after and care for our veterans. That is a debt we owe.

Once more it is my privilege to suggest that while we look after the veterans and do everything we can for them, we should do a little something about the foreign policy of this country which, war after war, gives us an ever larger crop of veterans. Unless we change our foreign policy soon there will be none but veterans in this country—called upon to support each other.

How would it be if for once we tried to do something about keeping some of our men from being killed, becoming veterans in wars which profit us nothing?

If we would vote as enthusiastically to keep out of war—for legislation to prevent war as we do for aid to veterans, some day there would be no veterans.

GEN. HOYT S. VANDENBERG

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force, has prepared a very important article which appears in this week's Saturday Evening Post. I want to commend the reading of that article to every Member of the House and the Senate as it contains information which I am sure will be valuable to all in whatever decisions have to be made.

There is one point in the article, however, which I desire to clarify a little bit for the newer Members because we here who were Members of the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses are all aware of the situation. He speaks of the inability of the Air Force to develop a proper tactical air force because of lack of appropriations. Every Member of this body should know that the House of Representatives appropriated more money in the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses for the construction of aircraft than was requested by the President and the Budget Bureau and that that money was impounded on orders of the President and, therefore, not spent. That should be pointed out in connection with this article because it certainly is not the fault of the House of Representatives that the United States Air Force and the naval air arm are not further along today toward the capacity to fight which we thought back in 1948 and still think they ought to have.

INDIA EMERGENCY FOOD AID ACT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, a bipartisan group in the House and in the Senate is today introducing the India Emergency Food Aid Act of 1951, to authorize 2,000,000 long tons of food grains for India and seeking appropriations for a million tons in this fiscal year. Speaking personally, I consider this one of the most important foreign-affairs measures we are likely to have before us in this Congress. It is intended to relieve a critical food situation in India during this year threatening starvation directly to an estimated 13,000,000 people, and affecting the rations of the 125,000,000 people of India now down to 9 ounces of food grains per day per person. It follows the traditional pattern of our relations with friendly peoples in utilizing our surplus to relieve distress.

It is a measure likely to contribute very materially to the stability and peace of the whole Far East, a critical famine in India paralleling that of 1943 could rock the governmental structure of that new and free nation to its foundations. In that sense there is a real analogy between this aid program and our programs to prevent disease and unrest in overseas areas in which we have had direct governmental responsibility.

Finally, there is no better demonstration anywhere that we mean what we say when we speak of freedom than would be this aid to India, for the position of the Government of India on condemning the Communist Chinese as aggressors in Korea has been directly opposed to ours in the United Nations, and to my own and that of Members generally. Yet, despite our complete disagreement on that point, we would not be denying to India the food aid she so urgently needs. A more convincing demonstration that democracy does not imply retaliation for disagreement, so typical of communism, could hardly be found.

Appended hereto is the text of the House bill and the statement issued by the sponsors in connection with its introduction:

A bill to furnish emergency food relief assistance to India

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "India Emergency Food Aid Act of 1951."

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this act to promote the foreign policy and the national interest of the United States and the cause of world peace by providing during the calendar year 1951 emergency food relief assistance to the people of India out of surplus grains available in the United States, in order to prevent starvation brought about by famine conditions in India.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President not in excess of $190,000,000 for the purpose of this act, including necessary administrative expenses, of which not in excess of one-half shall be available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and the balance shall be available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1952: Provided, however, That with respect to the procurement of any agricultural product within the United States for the purpose of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall certify that such agricultural commodity is available in excess of the domestic requirements, stockpiling, and existing commitments: And provided further, That the assistance hereunder shall be for the sole purpose of providing food to meet the emergency need arising from the extraordinary sequence of flood, droughts, and other natural disasters suffered by India in 1950.

SEC. 4. No assistance under authority of this act shall be made available nor shall any funds appropriated hereunder be expended until an agreement is entered into between India and the United States containing the following undertakings, and any others the President may determine to be desirable to carry out the purposes of this act, on the part of India:

(a) To distribute the relief supplies made available under this act, as well as similar supplies produced locally or imported from outside sources, among the people of India without discrimination as to race, creed, or political belief.

(b) To give full and continuous publicity in India to the assistance furnished by the United States.

(c) To permit persons designated by the Government of the United States to observe without restriction the distribution in India of commodities and other assistance made available under authority of this act.

(d) To deposit in a special account amounts of the currency of India equivalent to the amounts of such currency accruing to the Government of India from the import and sale of commodities furnished as a grant hereunder, this account to be utilized as may be agreed upon by the United States and the Government of India for the benefit of the people of India in programs to improve and increase food production and distribution.

(e) To take all appropriate measures to reduce its needs for assistance; to encourage increased production and distribution of foodstuffs within India; and to lessen the danger of similar future emergencies.

(f) To make available to the Government of the United States local currency in amounts required by it to meet its local currency, administrative, and operating expenses in India in connection with assistance supplied under this act.

SEC. 5. Local currency made available to the United States by the Government of India under the provisions of the agreement required by section 4 may be used for local currency, administrative, and operating expenses in India in connection with assistance provided by this act without charge against appropriated funds.

SEC. 6. Assistance provided under this act shall be provided under the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, applicable to and consistent with the purposes of this act.

SEC. 7. All or any portion of the funds made available under authority of this act may be transferred by the President to any department or agency of the executive branch of the Government, to be expended for the purpose of this act. Funds so transferred may be expended under the authority of any provisions of law, not inconsistent with this act, applicable to the departments or agencies concerned, except that funds so transferred shall not be commingled with other funds of such departments or agencies and shall be accounted for separately.

SEC. 8. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed, until such time as an appropriation shall be made pursuant to section 3 of this act, to make advances not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this act in such manner, at such time, and in such amounts as the President shall determine, and no interest shall be charged on advances made by the Treasury to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for this purpose. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be repaid without interest for advances made by it hereunder, from funds made available for the purpose of this act.

SEC. 9. All or any part of the assistance provided hereunder shall be promptly terminated by the President (a) whenever he determines that (1) India is not complying with the undertakings in the agreement entered into under section 4 of this act, or is diverting from the purpose of this act assistance provided hereunder; or (2) because of changed conditions, continuance of assistance is unnecessary, or no longer consistent with the national interest or the foreign policy of the United States; or, (b) whenever the Congress by concurrent resolution finds termination is desirable. Termination of assistance to India under this section shall include the termination of deliveries of all supplies scheduled under this act and not yet delivered.

A bipartisan group today introduced in the House of Representatives the India Emergency Food Aid Act of 1951. The group includes the following members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs: Representatives FRANCES P. BOLTON, Republican, Ohio; THURMOND CHATHAM, Democrat, North Carolina; JAMES G. FULTON, Republican, Pennsylvania; CHRISTIAN A. HERTER, Republican, Massachusetts; J. K. JAVITS, Republican-Liberal, New York; WALTER H. JUDD, Republican, Minnesota; EDNA F. KELLY, Democrat, New York; THOMAS E. MORGAN, Democrat, Pennsylvania; ABRAHAM A. RIBICOFF, Democrat, Connecticut; and the following other Members of the House: Representatives EMANUEL CELLER, Democrat, New York; and ROY W. WIER, Democrat, Minnesota.

In connection with the introduction of the bill, the sponsors stated: "We have introduced this bill because of our firm belief that a favorable response by the United States to the request of the Government of India for help in an acute emergency food shortage with dire threat of famine is in the best interests of the traditional policy of friendship and good will between the people of the United States and the people of India. Unless we act promptly, there is grave danger that about 13,000,000 people of India will be directly affected by famine conditions. We shall do our utmost to see that the aid is granted and in time.

"We consider the need to avoid starvation in India entirely separate from all political considerations. There are no political strings and no reservations of a political character attached to the bill we are introducing. We do not want our desire to help the suffering people of India, within the reasonable limits of our capacity, to be regarded as in any sense lessening our opposition to the apparent views of the Government of India with respect to the Communist aggression in Korea. On the other hand, our firm opposition to this apparent position on the part of the Government of India does not lessen in the least our desire to help relieve the acute food shortage in India.

"Our bill calls for an authorization of $190,000,000, the estimated amount of the cost of the 2,000,000 long tons of grain needed without shipping costs (which we understand are to be provided by the Government of India), one-half to be available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, the balance during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1952. We have provided for the authorization in this way in response to the Presidential message which recommends appropriation for 1,000,000 tons of grain at this time and then a survey of the situation to see what else is needed. Our bill also calls for administration of this aid program by the ECA.

"In summary, we urge this food aid on the basis of the relationship between people and people, those of the United States and those of India, in the hope that the deep sympathy which it expresses will further fortify the bonds of friendship between the two peoples and give further support and encouragement to the new free nation of India."

HOW LONG ARE WE GOING TO APPEASE THOSE WHO SEEK TO DESTROY US?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, apropos of what the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] had to say I am wondering if the time will ever come when we shall cease to appease those who are seeking to destroy us.

THIRTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF LITHUANIA

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks as this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, it is my happy privilege to commemorate the thirty-third anniversary of the independence of Lithuania. The anniversary of this birth of freedom in the Baltic Republic is celebrated each year throughout the world on February 16. It is an anniversary the world must not forget—it is a warning to aggressors and a challenge to the free. Lithuania is waiting not only with patience but with confidence that the independence declared on February 16, 1918, and enjoyed until 1940, shall again be hers. As Shakespeare wrote: "For though usurpers sway the rule awhile, yet heavens are just, and time suppresseth wrongs."

I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a sturdy, gallant, and resolute people who have made many significant contributions to the cause of human justice and freedom. I am keenly aware that many weighty matters of great national and international importance are awaiting your earnest attention, but it would be inexcusable if we did not pause, however, briefly to pay heartfelt tribute to a sister republic and to bestow on that republic the honor and acclaim which it so richly deserves.

Lithuania is a small country. It is essentially an agricultural country, the soil claiming more than 75 percent of a population of approximately 3,000,000. The independence of Lithuania was recognized by most of the great powers in 1918, and by Russia in the Treaty of Moscow. The Lithuanians have had first-hand experience with Bolshevik ruthlessness in that turbulent period. They survived it, they triumphed over it. They succeeded in forming their own representative government. They succeeded magnificently in carrying on their day-to-day affairs with courage and dignity despite their close and highly dangerous geographical proximity to the sinister Soviet tyranny.

During the chaotic period following World War I, the Lithuanians suffered the loss of Vilna, their historic capital. Two decades later the Nazis robbed them of Memel, their chief port. Shortly after World War II, the Soviet Government demanded the right to establish military, naval, and air bases in Lithuania. The country was quickly reduced to a state of vassalage and then occupied completely. Lithuania was among the first victims of insatiable Soviet aggression. The history of free Lithuania is unfortunately a short history and a sad one. It is the tragic yet inspiring history of a devout and freedom-loving people trying very hard to carry on their honorable and peaceful pursuits despite the constant threat and menace of unscrupulous and predatory neighbors.

We grieve for the resolute and heroic Catholic nation, because at this moment in history it is temporarily enslaved. Yet we glory in its past achievements and in the fierce and undying determination of its unconquerable people to regain at whatever cost and sacrifice their former liberty and independence.

The Lithuanians are one with us and with all the people of the free world in their wholehearted dedication to the great principles and ideals of democratic freedom. They are one with us in sharing that glorious Christian culture which nurtured Europe through many bleak and stormy centuries and which, please God, is surely to triumph over the menacing forces of oppression and tyranny.

We are therefore proud to commemorate Lithuanian Independence Day, and to express the sincere hope that Lithuania may soon resume its honored place and position among the free nations of the world. We hope that soon the white knight may ride again, freely as of yore, and the yellow, green, and red banner may again wave unhindered to symbolize Lithuania's ripened harvests of grain, her green forests, and the patriot blood which has not yet ceased to flow.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and, of course, I shall not object, may I inquire what the program will be for next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Consent Calendar will be called and on Tuesday the Private Calendar will be called. There is no other business for the rest of the week. I do not want, by this statement, to bind myself that there will not be any, but I have none to announce to the House. I want to frankly advise the House that I know of none now that is likely to come up next week.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman will give us 24 hours' notice, I take it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Absolutely. I will give all the advance notice possible. Insofar as I am able now, so that the Members may be guided to some extent in their actions, I will state I know of nothing that is likely to come up next week. I know of no bill to be reported out of committee, but if there should be, we could wait until the week after next.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MORRIS asked and was given permission to address the House on Tuesday next for 30 minutes, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DORN], is recognized for 30 minutes.

FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I feel somewhat diffident, somewhat reluctant, to come before you this morning, but I feel that the international situation, the international crisis which we find ourselves in today, warrants some sound, honest thinking on this subject. I honestly believe that there is not a more patriotic group of Americans anywhere in this country than the 435 Members of this House. I am convinced that there is not a man or woman here who would not give his or her life to solve this great international crisis we are in today.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] and those who signed his declaration of policy on yesterday. I wish to compliment them for bringing this matter to the attention of the House and to the attention of the people of this country. Also I wish to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], my leader, for participating in that debate, because I believe that this great international crisis today can only be solved right here in this House through the duly elected Representatives of the people of this country. The people of America are the ones who will pay the bill. The people of America are the ones who will do the dying. So, I would like to see this House and the other body have more of a voice in shaping the foreign policy of our great country.

Mr. Speaker, I come before you today representing a people who are international-minded and have been for many years, back to the days when Charles Pinckney and Thomas Pinckney were ambassadors abroad during the time of the Revolution, and after. Since that time South Carolina has also greatly assisted this country in formulating our foreign policy. It is my honor to represent the district once represented by that famous Secretary of State and Secretary of War, John C. Calhoun. I represent part of the district recently represented by James F. Byrnes, our great Secretary of State. Some of our contemporary leaders, in addition to Mr. Byrnes, from my great State well versed in foreign affairs are Mr. Bernard Baruch, and the Honorable John R. Peurifoy, presently Ambassador to Greece.

I speak to you today humbly, and with a sincere feeling of my own shortcomings and inabilities. I hope you will bear in mind that I do not claim to be an expert on foreign or military affairs. I only come to you as a representative of the grass roots of America. The only qualification I have for speaking on foreign and military policy is the fact that I served in Europe for 20 months as an enlisted man; all the way from the coast of Normandy to within 100 miles of Berlin. I studied the topography, the characteristics of the people, and the stamina of those people to resist aggression; therefore I feel qualified, at least to a certain extent, to come before you today.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have you recall with me this morning the speech I made from this floor on May 7, 1947. It is practically the same speech in substance that I am going to make to you in a few minutes.

For that speech, as you will recall, I was listed as the No. 1 enemy of communism and a warmonger by Vishinsky on September 18 of that year at Lake Success, N. Y., heading a list of distinguished Americans.

Many Congressmen asked me the question then, right here, why they picked me, a freshman Member of this body, to label as a warmonger and attack constantly in the press of Russia. The answer to me was obvious. I advocated in that speech the one force that Russia feared more than any other force on earth, that is an invincible Air Force. I am still advocating that great offensive, defensive, and peace force today. I was again viciously attacked by the Russian press on several occasions that year when I suggested that some of the Marshall plan funds be used instead for the building of this Air Force.

It is my understanding that a great controversy is now raging within the Pentagon over the respective merits of sea power, land power, and the Air Force. Out of this controversy will come a policy that will lead us to peace, victory, or to extermination. It is our duty, as Representatives of the American people, to help unite all of these factions, as well as the American people, on a foreign and military strategy that will preserve this Nation for generations to come.

There is likewise a great debate raging over this Nation between the forces of semi-isolationism and of internationalism. This debate, in reality, has been going on since William Jennings Bryan resigned as Secretary of State in 1916 in protest over measures which he said would lead to American participation in a foreign war. This debate was carried on with great fervor by President Wilson, Henry Cabot Lodge, and Hiram Johnson. Again it flared in the late 1930's between Roosevelt, Wheeler, Lindbergh, and many others. And again today this controversy is becoming intensely heated between such leaders as Hoover, Taft, Dewey, and the present administration.

I want to say right here that I am taking advantage of our President's offer of constructive criticism, made during his great speech here on this floor. I think this question should be worked out now. I am accepting his kind offer. Also, I believe in unity, but I think we should unite on a policy that will save America, save its men, save its money, and not wind up in the destruction of American democracy, our economy, and our great country.

I am offering a plan to this Congress and to this country which is not isolationist, nor is it the policy of wasting our money and manpower in a thousand areas over the world. It is a compromise plan upon which all of us can unite and which, I believe, has the backing of the majority of the American people today. This plan is to build the greatest strategic and defensive air command in world history, an overwhelming striking force based on the continent of North America itself, ready at all times to lay waste the industrial potential of Soviet Russia. Once this air force is built, it will be an easy matter to serve notice on the masters in the Kremlin that we will not tolerate aggression anywhere in the world; that the moment their satellites and stooges invade a freedom-loving people our bombers will instantly wing their way to the heart of the Communist dynasty in Russia itself. We have tried extending the hand of comradeship and brotherly love. This policy has failed. Now is the time for cold realism. We cannot bribe with money the sagging morale of democratic peoples. We cannot bolster their spirit with a few divisions of ground troops.

However, I am not in favor of offering any protection to people who are not willing to fight for their own existence.

I think one policy today which might lead this Nation to disaster is the one of balanced armed forces. I believe that some of our strategists are living in the past. I believe they have forgotten that the records of military history show that Napoleon Bonaparte was a lieutenant general at 27 years. Alexander the Great conquered the world before he was 33 years of age.

Hannibal was commander in chief of an army in Spain at the age of 25. They were young men with imagination, looking to the future, and they are recognized today as the three greatest military geniuses in the history of the world. Under our present system you cannot be a lieutenant general in the American land Army at the age of 27. You cannot be an admiral in the Navy at that age. You might possibly be a brigadier general in the Air Force at the age of 30. So I am not going along with this antique semimilitary dictatorship. My fellow countrymen, let me say this: We need to analyze our situation today. We need to plan for a given, definite course. We need a foreign policy—frankly I do not know what our foreign policy is today, and I do not believe anyone else does either, because we have no clear-cut policy. But I would like to see a foreign policy adopted as to where we are going to go and what we are going to do, and then plan our three branches of the military services accordingly.

From all indications I believe that the present military policy of the United States is too big a gamble. It can lead to disaster. That policy is akin to political expediency, one of carefully apportioning the funds for national defense equally between the Army, Navy, and the Air Force. This is a policy designed to get along with all the people at all times. It may lead to national disaster. We cannot simultaneously maintain the largest land army, the greatest air force, and the mightiest navy on earth. This policy can eventually bankrupt America and will not furnish the security freedom-loving peoples everywhere so earnestly desire. Already this policy of pouring money all over the world and, at the same time, building up balanced forces has carried America a long way toward a military dictatorship. We are losing our freedom under a false program of trying to preserve it. This policy cannot defend simultaneously Europe, all of Asia, Africa, South America, and the many islands against the overwhelming land superiority of the Eurasian Continent. America's military defense today, which also is the defense of democracy everywhere, should be composed of a land army with emphasis on airborne troops that can be sent to any area of the Western Hemisphere on a moment's notice; highly trained, mobile, super troops; young men with every training advantage that can be rushed overnight to Alaska, Greenland, or any other area directly affecting the security of the Western World. These troops should be based in North America proper and in our island possessions. This land force should consist of a powerful national guard, of a reserve composed of practically every able-bodied American citizen, ready to be called out to patrol the Nation in case of bombing and to do rescue work. Our Navy should be given sufficient strength to remain in surface command of the seven seas, with emphasis on destroyers, light carriers, submarines, and light, fast, and highly maneuverable vessels. Our Air Force should be built and maintained at a level far exceeding that of the combined air forces of the world. Once this Air Force reaches the point where it is sufficiently strong to seriously threaten Russian industry then we should immediately adopt a strong foreign policy. We could then tell Russia bluntly that we will not permit the invasion of any free nations anywhere in the world. We should then, at once, recognize the complete independence of Western Germany, accept her as our equal in the western bloc of nations, and give her the green light to build whatever army necessary to defend herself; immediately accept Spain as an equal partner. We should guarantee these nations and the rest of Europe that the minute they are attacked our Air Force will strike Russia. We should also recognize Japan as completely independent and call on her for a land army of several million men and make her the same promise of air support.

You know, I am shocked and surprised to see some Members of the House of Representatives who think we have to maintain bases in Europe in order to bomb Russia. We have planes today that can take off from the continental United States, bomb Moscow, and return without refueling, flying at a height of more than 8 miles and at speeds in excess of 400 miles per hour. The only reason Russia today has not already moved into Western Europe is because of their fear of retaliation over the North Pole, which retaliation would pierce the industrial heart of this giant octopus reaching its tentacles out over the Eurasian Continent.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that we cannot build a larger land army than Russia in Europe. That is a very desperate gamble trying to match the great hordes of the Red army man for man on the continent of Europe. Suppose we lose that gamble. We have billions of dollars tied up in such a big land army. Suppose it is defeated. That will open the United States to attack.

I am convinced, along with a large part of the American people, that we cannot win a big land war in Europe or in China or in Siberia. In considering this proposal we should go back first to Napoleon's invasion of Russia. Napoleon for months accumulated vast stores of supplies, wagon trains, artillery, and equipment the like of which the world had never before seen, on the very borders of Russia. The attack began June 23, 1812, with over 600,000 crack soldiers. Napoleon reached Moscow in the fall of that year, but was swallowed up by the vastness of that country, by incessant attacks on his lines and supplies, and finally by the bitter Russian winter. He finally fled back into France with less than 100,000 of this magnificent attacking force. Hitler invaded Russia June 22, 1941, 129 years later, less one day. At the time of Hitler's attack the Soviet Union had a population of less than 200,000,000. Hitler and his direct allies held sway over 242,500,000 people. At this time Germany and her allies produced more than 50,000,000 tons of steel annually, compared to the Russian output of approximately 19,000,000 tons annually. The Nazi army was composed of veteran troops, numbered in the millions, with everything to be desired in the way of tanks, artillery, and equipment beyond imagination. She bordered on Russia itself and started the invasion on a 2,000-mile front. In December of that year Guderian of Von Bock's Nazi army was turned back 13 miles from downtown Moscow. The attack was started with nearly 200 divisions. Hitler's army eventually met the fate of Napoleon's.

It is interesting to note that in 1941, contrary to American public opinion whipped up by the American propagandist, that no American equipment of any consequence had reached the Russian front. The German invasion started in June. The American-Russian lend-lease bill passed Congress 2 months later, in August. Before any of this equipment could reach the Russian troops they had stopped the German Army cold on the 2,000-mile front.

Less than 4 years later the Russian Army had ground their way into Berlin and to all of south central Europe. The bulk of German manpower and equipment was left behind in the bitter defeat on the frozen Steppes of the Soviet Union. The Russian Army had steadily grown greater until at the close of the war it was at the zenith of its power. To give the world full warning that there would be no complacency and no let-up on the part of Russia to maintain and increase the efficiency of this army, Marshal George K. Zhukov, Russia's greatest general, declared on the 24th of June 1945, on Red Square in Moscow:

> After 4 years of savage battles, we have entered a period of peaceful growth. The Soviet state has emerged ever more mighty from the grim struggle which we waged, and the Red army has become the most modern and powerful army in the world. But for us Soviet peoples it is unseemly to become conceited—or complacent. In the future too we must strengthen the economic power of our country, unceasingly perfect our military skill, study the rich experiences of the fatherland war, and develop our military science.

With Zhukov's words in mind today, 6 years later, and with China, Manchuria, Tibet, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Eastern Germany, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, and parts of Austria added to Soviet might it is safe to assume that Russia today has a much more powerful land army than all of the rest of the land armies of the world combined. I am shocked, along with many other Americans, to see our military strategists apparently planning to challenge this might on the continent of Europe. It seems they are planning the next war on the military concepts of World Wars I and II. It seems that for sentimental reasons they want to go "back to Tipperary." Their ears seem to be tuned to that World War I song, Over There. They appear to be thinking in terms of another Maginot Line. They, above all people, should know that Western Europe cannot be held in terms of pure defense. Such a European army in order to escape being pushed into the channel must advance and seize all of Russia before an ultimate victory. This cannot be done, certainly not while, at the same time, we are trying to defend Korea, Japan, Indochina, Iran, India, and a hundred other places.

The question is immediately asked, Should we abandon Europe to her fate? In the first place, Russia would not advance into Western Europe in the face of overwhelming air power based in North America, ready to strike over the North Pole at the heart of her industrial potential. If Russia did advance and occupied Western Europe, extending her armies to the Atlantic, she would be more vulnerable than ever. It is extremely doubtful that the Russian armies would remain in Western Europe or India or any other far-flung battle lines while their loved ones were being destroyed in an atomic blitz at home. It is interesting at this juncture to recall Robert E. Lee's great army at Richmond. It was not defeated as much by Grant as by General Sherman, who, in the heart of the Confederacy, was destroying its railroads, food supplies, foundries, and munitions factories; threatening the women and children and causing Lee's veterans to desert by the thousands. Lee's army collapsed because Sherman pierced the Confederate heart. The Russian Government, with its armies in foreign countries hundreds of miles from home, would be embarrassed by the destruction of its cities and industry and would be faced with revolution in the homeland. No government could maintain control over its people at home or its far-away armies under an overwhelming air attack, particularly when that government had sent its armies away for the purpose of aggression. While the Russian armies are away our Air Force will be our General Sherman to render those armies impotent.

How do we propose to stay in Western Europe with a big land army on defense—just purely Maginot-line thinking? Of all people, our military strategists should know that in order to win we must advance and hit the heart of the enemy and occupy the country. In this day it simply cannot be done. Therefore, it is too big a gamble to risk.

I do not want to abandon Europe. I do not think we should abandon any freedom-loving people anywhere in the world, particularly after spending so many billions of dollars and so much blood; but the question is, How are we going to save them? With a great Air Force based in North America, ready to strike over no man's land—the North Pole—where no gorgeous supercarriers can sail, where no battleships can prowl, where no foot soldiers can exist—the temperature 30,000 feet above the North Pole is the same as the temperature 30,000 feet over the Equator. That is the no man's land of world war III. Alaska is more important to security of the United States than Europe. Let us not be misled by this European land army talk.

Did you know that the United States today already borders Soviet Russia? A Russian foot soldier can walk in the wintertime from Russian soil across the Bering Sea into our Territory, Alaska. I was told by a high-ranking general that they could take Alaska in 48 hours. They could lay air landing strips in another 48 hours, and could bomb every city in the United States in a few days more. Oh, gentlemen, let us put first things first. Let us adopt a sensible policy.

Did you know that no great leader of past world history has ever based his military concepts entirely on the textbooks of the past? Alexander the Great and his father, Philip of Macedonia, developed the great Greek phalanx, and with only 35,000 men he was able to defeat the Persian host of a million men.

Go to the Bible. David did not go out there to fight man to man with the giant Goliath. He just could not do it. He used his ingenuity. He used his skill, and he won. Napoleon Bonaparte, when called upon by the government to defend the government buildings against a mob, did something new. He massed his artillery around the directory. Thirty thousand bodies of the mob lay dead in the streets the next morning without ever having made contact with the foot soldiers surrounding the government buildings.

Great nations of the past have concentrated on one single overwhelming instrumentality of war. The Roman legion was for 500 years the most feared power on the face of this earth. It was a peace force; no nation, no people dared challenge the might of Rome for nearly 500 years, the greatest era of peace the world has ever known. Turn with me back to the year 1500 when Great Britain, a dot on the map of the world, just a little nation, a little island, laid the basis for world power. They did not go out and try to match the land powers of the world. Great Britain was headed by smart men, who meeting in London, said: "We cannot match the continental powers of Europe, but we will build the greatest navy the world has ever known." In the next 400 years they spent more money on their navy than on their government and army combined; and Britannia ruled the waves for 400 years, the second greatest era of peace the world has ever known.

My fellow countrymen, listen. Lieutenant General Koller, of the German Air Force, after surveying the indescribable horror of what American air power had heaped in his country, with 80 percent of its industry incapacitated and the will power of his people destroyed by air raids, made this very significant statement after the war:

> We are decimated, defeated, and eliminated from world competition.

General Koller continued:

> The nation that controls the air will control the sea lanes of the world, will control the continents of the world. It will be interesting to watch from the sidelines the game of power politics.
> The nation that controls the air will control this world and dominate this world for the next hundred years.

He meant, of course, that the only nation that could do that was America. He also doubted, Mr. Speaker, that we would do it, because he was a student of our past international policy.

I hear over and over again some of the military strategists of the last two World Wars, who are still in power and who are now planning for a third war, say that the next war will be won or lost over the dead bodies of the American foot soldiers. Neither the dead bodies of the foot soldiers nor rifles in their hands can defend the helpless women and children of America from a hail of death falling from jet planes 40,000 or 50,000 feet above rain, snow, sleet, and fog. The people of Kansas City, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Denver, and Omaha cannot be protected by gorgeous super aircraft carriers in the far-away Atlantic or Pacific. The only force that can protect central United States from the fate of Hiroshima and Nagasaki is American air power. Out of the frozen North where no land armies can exist and where no aircraft carriers and no battleships can sail, will come death to American industry and her people if we neglect our Air Force. The North Pole is no man's land and the only power that can travel this no man's land is our fighters and bombers seeking the heart of an unscrupulous enemy.

Foot soldiers cannot deliver the atomic bomb, the hydrogen bomb, or even TNT into the heart of Russia. Neither can carriers or battleships. The only force that can bring war to the heart of Russia is the American Air Force. Balanced forces are a terrible gamble, at the best. Big land armies in Europe are a great gamble. But in building a powerful Air Force and relying principally on it for defense and offense we make no gamble at all. With overwhelming air superiority we cannot be invaded across the Atlantic or the Pacific, whereas if the land gamble fails we might be open to immediate attack and possibly invasion. The greatest defense America has today against submarines is the American strategic air command. The battle against submarines is won most effectively by bombing the places where submarines are made, that is Port Arthur, Vladivostok, Murmansk, Leningrad, and the other Baltic seaports. Likewise, Russia's greatest defense against our land armies on a thousand fronts across the seven seas will be the bombing of our shipyards, harbors, embarkation centers, and factories supplying those distant armies.

In this great controversy now going on in the Pentagon, about land troops versus air power, the question of Korea is constantly injected. It is my observation that in this House and elsewhere the advocates of victory over the dead bodies of our foot soldiers are pointing to Korea with glee. Korea, more than any other place or any other experience, confirms my belief in the immediate need for overwhelming air power. In the first place, I do not believe any sane military man would entertain even the thought that North Korea would have crossed the thirty-eighth parallel had we possessed a thousand B–36's and B–50's, based in California, Hawaii, Alaska, and over the islands of the Pacific, loaded with the atomic bomb, or even with TNT. If we had possessed such an air force prior to the Korean invasion and had warned North Korea never to cross the thirty-eighth parallel, there would have been another consultation between the North Korean leaders and the Kremlin. They would never have crossed into South Korea under the threat of having every village in North Korea wiped off the face of the earth in one raid. No amount of persuasion could have ever encouraged them to move against such a threat. North Korea and the Kremlin knew only too well that our 70 group Air Force had been cut to a few groups of modern up-to-date planes. The Far Eastern Air Command had been decreased until it was almost nonexistent. Since the outbreak of the war it has been limited in that it has not been allowed to bomb the sources from which armies and materials have come. But for the little air power that was available, our forces in the early stages of the Korean war would have been pushed into the sea, and the present strange withdrawal of the Communist forces, with their overwhelming manpower, is due mainly to the incessant pounding they are taking from the air.

Air power is peace power. We are playing Russia's game in Korea today; we are playing it almost as perfectly, Mr. Speaker, as if Russia herself had directed it. She is lulling us to sleep; she is making us think that world war III can be won by balanced forces, just like we are trying to put into Korea, and we are falling for it. Russia is not going to let the cat out of the sack at this stage of the game; they are going to wait until we have our forces stretched thin, until we are weakened economically, until we have our men on a thousand battlefields and battleships. Then she will strike out over the mist of the North Pole to Alaska and New York.

I have read in the newspapers recently about the great battleship Missouri bombarding the coast of North Korea. That battleship would last just a few minutes if Russia wanted to sink her. Do you remember the Repulse? Do you remember the Prince of Wales? Do you remember our battle fleet at Pearl Harbor?

This is indeed the time of decision. The only course open to the American people today is, in the words of Woodrow Wilson:

> Presently America will be surprised to find herself growing old, when she will adopt a new regimen of life. She will have to husband her industry, concentrate her resources; she will have to trust her best, not her average, men—that will be the time of change.

Mr. Speaker, the great Russian bear has perfected its land army. It is ready to move for instant action. She has today variously estimated in numbers from 1,000 to 3,500 heavy bombers. She is only waiting now until that force gets to be of sufficient size and strength that she can cripple and paralyze the United States. Then, Mr. Speaker, their land army will move and America will be at the mercy of the Russian hammer and sickle; unless we prepare now.

Let us adopt a wise policy. Let us build the greatest air force the world has ever seen. Do you know that one B–36 costs $3,500,000. Seventeen billion five hundred million dollars can build the adequate strategic air force we need. That is, 5,000 heavy bombers. That is only a small fraction of the money we propose to spend in Europe, that is only a small fraction of the relief money we have lost and given away since World War II. Air power is not only peace power, it is also economy power.

My plea today is to reassert your authority as Members of the House of Representatives of the United States of America. Let us give this country the kind of a foreign policy it needs.

I remember going to the State capital of Georgia, the capitol building of the State of my good friend and distinguished and able colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [EUGENE COX]. There on the monument of Benjamin H. Hill were his immortal words:

> He who saves his country saves all things,
> All things saved will bless him.
> He who lets his country die lets all things die > and
> All things dying curse him.

Let us not play the game of Russia. Let us not do exactly what she wants us to do.

How many casualties have we suffered in Korea? Fifty thousand. How many has Russia suffered? Zero. All right. Who is winning? Who is playing whose game?

Mr. Speaker, I am thinking about the democracy of this country. I want to preserve it because I am a young man. I want to enjoy it because I hope my life is not over yet. Yes, I would gladly give my life if I could solve the international situation and I know you would, too. Let me plead with you again, let us put first things first.

Right here let me say that I dislike exceedingly to disagree with the so-called experts of our time. I have, however, somewhat lost faith in our experts as such. I recall that many of our strategists before Pearl Harbor said our Pacific fleet was invincible; that Japan could be brought to her knees in a matter of weeks. I remember that many experts said Hitler would not last through the winter of 1939 after his invasion of Poland; that his regime would collapse of internal unrest; that the French Maginot line would hold, and the Nazi hordes would never reach Paris; also, that when attacked by Hitler, Russia would not last 6 weeks; that American boys would never be sent to Europe; and that England would do the job. Also, I remember how some of the experts castigated Gen. Billy Mitchell and forced his retirement for his views about air power. I remember, too, how the experts practically guaranteed the American people that there would be no more war in our lifetime; that the United Nations would solve all of our international problems; that Uncle Joe Stalin was a great world benefactor, a believer in democracy, and that we could get along with "Uncle Joe."

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORN. I yield to the distinguished and able gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. A year ago before Korea, they were saying that if the Communist army moved at 4 o'clock in the morning we would be ready at 5.

Mr. DORN. Exactly. Also, I remember many of the experts stating that the Communist rumblings in China were only an agrarian revolt. So, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I frankly no longer believe everything the experts tell the American people. It is interesting to note, however, at this juncture, that a few experts told the truth, but their warnings went unheeded. Outstanding among these were Gen. Billy Mitchell and Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky.

I think what we need in this country today is some common, old-fashioned horse sense. That is what we need. I only represent the grass roots of America, as many of you do, and it is for them that I am pleading today.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

(Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a proclamation issued by the Governor of the State of Indiana.)

THIRTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIA'S FREEDOM

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, February 16, marks the thirty-third anniversary of Lithuania's freedom which was inaugurated on February 16, 1918, by a declaration of independence creating the free Republic of Lithuania.

On that date the patriotic spirit of all Lithuanians, and of peoples of Lithuanian descent, was at its zenith. Every freedom-loving person throughout the world, regardless of nationality, was happy to learn that the Lithuanian nation was again embarking upon what they hoped would be a long period of independence and freedom.

Lithuania is one of the old nations of the European continent. In 1795, when Russia first occupied Lithuania, a period of enslavement continued for a century and a quarter. During this time the patriotism and loyalty which is always alive in the hearts of Lithuanians, enabled its people to constantly carry on an incessant fight against the conquering tyrant who temporarily controlled the government. The opportunity came on February 16, 1918, when Lithuania unshackled the tyrant's irons and declared its independence by establishing the Lithuanian Republic. Soviet Russia at that time renounced all rights to the territory of Lithuania and recognized the nation as a free and independent state.

Free Lithuania immediately proceeded to make progress as a nation and soon was acknowledged as one of the most progressive, cultured, and industrious nations in Europe. The year 1940 again brought disappointment, sorrow, and grief to this young nation when it was occupied by Russia for the second time. The territory of Lithuania was desecrated by the Nazis and the Soviets for the next few years, when in 1944, the Russians again occupied this country and this usurpation has continued to the present day. Over a million of its people have been murdered or taken prisoner and the Soviet Union is continuing its domination and liquidation of the leaders and people of Lithuania. Deportations, arrests, and humiliations have been inflicted by the Communists, and the Lithuanian people are constantly in fear of the dictator's slave-labor camps, within and beyond its borders.

The United States and other free nations continue to recognize the free and independent nation of Lithuania and disregard the usurpers and dictators now holding the country under temporary control. It is my earnest hope that the steps taken by the United Nations when Soviet aggression and infiltration broke out in South Korea, will prove to eventually bring about the halt of the expanding dictator, Stalin, and his desire to conquer the world. The free and democratic countries in the world must stand shoulder to shoulder in this fight. America has learned through experience that aggression and slavery anywhere on the globe is a constant threat to our own liberty and the liberty of all free nations If our free nations continue this fight, Stalin and his Soviet dictatorship will eventually be destroyed by insurrection from within or defeated by forces from without. That day will eventually come, and let us hope it will be soon.

When that day arrives, Lithuania will again take its place among the free and independent nations of the world, with the rededication of another declaration of independence, the same as they did 33 years ago tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, February 16, will mark the thirty-third anniversary of Lithuanian independence. In addition to the remarks which I delivered on the floor of the House commemorating this occasion, I wish to hereby submit a proclamation issued by Henry F. Schricker, Governor of the State of Indiana, setting out a redeclaration of Indiana citizens, hoping that Lithuania will soon be unshackled from the conqueror and resume its rightful position as a free self-governing independent nation.

President Albert G. Vinick, of East Chicago, Ind., conveys on behalf of the American Lithuanian Council, identical sentiments as set out in the following proclamation:

STATE OF INDIANA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Indianapolis.

PROCLAMATION FOR REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA DAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1951

To All to Whom These Presents May Come, Greeting:

Whereas the 16th day of February 1951 will mark the thirty-third anniversary of the declaration of independence by the people of the Republic of Lithuania; and

Whereas on that day the citizens of the State of Indiana who are of Lithuanian origin or descent will convene in various communities throughout the State to commemorate that occasion and to join their countrymen in the grief of a liberty-loving nation caused by the aggression and acts of injustice of the Soviet Union which took over Lithuania by force of arms, usurped the sovereign and inalienable rights of the Lithuanian people and proceeded with the extermination of them by mass deportation, imprisonment, and execution; and

Whereas the Lithuanian people are strongly opposed to foreign occupation and oppression and are determined to restore their freedom and sovereignty which has always been recognized by the Government of the United States of America; and

Whereas because of their unmistakable attitude toward communism struggling for world domination, the Lithuanian people, together with a million Americans of Lithuanian descent, represent an important force in the present fight of free nations against the Communist aggression; and

Whereas the residents of the State of Indiana feel deep sympathy for the gallant people of Lithuania and of other countries, presently enslaved by the Kremlin imperialism;

Now, therefore, I, Henry F. Schricker, the Governor of the State of Indiana, proclaim and designate February 16, 1951, as Republic of Lithuania Day throughout the State of Indiana and commend all interested groups, organizations, and individuals to appropriately observe the occasion, encouraging the Lithuanian people and wishing that they soon attain their goal of freedom and independence which they so ardently desire and cherish, and to which they have every right.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State of Indiana, at the capitol, in the city of Indianapolis, this 4th day of February 1951.

By the Governor:

[SEAL] HENRY F. SCHRICKER,
Governor of Indiana.
LELAND L. SMITH,
Secretary of State.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

(Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a radio broadcast.)

FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the day that the Americans entered World War II Winston Churchill, speaking of that day, said, "That is what I have dreamed of, aimed at, and worked for, and now it has come to pass." You will recall that before our men entered World War II Mr. Churchill said, and I quote: "Just give us the tools and we will finish the job." That is, Britain would carry on and win the war. Perhaps at the time he made the latter statement he actually believed it. Nevertheless, from the beginning—all the time—he was working, maneuvering, to get us into war. He succeeded. The war was won and from that day to this we have been aiding Britain. Apparently, that same thing is happening again. It is easy to agree, as do most of the American people, with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DORN]. He served here before. We all know that he is sincere, that he is patriotic, that his words come from his heart, and, moreover, are based upon the experience in the last war which entitles him to speak, not for the politicians or, if you prefer, the statesmen, not for the military experts, the generals, or the admirals, but for the men who in every war do the actual fighting.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the day which I have been looking forward to for a long, long time. A day when those in the House, who know very well, who for months have known what their people wanted, when those who are paid to come here and represent their people at long, long last spoke out, in opposition to the policy which we are following which will destroy us.

I notice the morning paper quoted Justice Douglas of the United States Supreme Court as saying that if we continued to follow our present foreign policy it would only lead to our destruction. That policy which was condemned by Mr. Joseph P. Kennedy, our former Ambassador to England. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. JOHN F. KENNEDY, who after a 5-week trip in Europe made the statement which I will now read as a part of my remarks.

Said our colleague:

ISSUES IN THE DEFENSE OF WESTERN EUROPE

I have just returned from a 5-week trip through Europe. My purpose in making this trip grew out of my realization that the most important task that would face this country and its Government during the next few months would be the question of our relationship to Western Europe in the face of the growing threat of Soviet expansion. Upon the correct solution of that problem hangs the fate of millions of American lives—indeed, the very survival of the Nation may hinge upon it.

I spent my time in three countries—England, France, and Italy—who are the chief European members of the North Atlantic Pact, and in three countries—West Germany, Yugoslavia, and Spain—who are not members of that alliance but whose problems, whose loyalties, and whose capacities are tied into the question of the defense of Western Europe.

This issue of whether and how Western Europe can be defended, with or without American aid, depends, as everyone agrees—and as General Eisenhower only a few days ago told us—on the existence in these countries of a will to resist—a determination to build up within them singly and collectively forces that, together with such aid as we may supply them, have a reasonable chance of dealing with the threatened aggression from the east. In trying to analyze the quality of their determination, I talked with men of every level—with French and German generals, with prime ministers and cabinet members, with our ambassadors, our high commissioner in Germany, with political leaders, with Tito, and with the man in the street. The problem of European morale is, however, not merely what men say. It is also what men do. It is the capacity of their industry to devote significant portions to war purposes and still produce enough for basic and essential needs. It is their attitude toward manpower and its conscription, toward controls, toward taxes. It is their willingness to make sacrifices, to face deprivation, even to starve in defense of freedom. These are the thing without which armies destined for victory cannot be built, and we must find them without ourselves, as well as within others, if we would defend ourselves and our allies and those who might become our allies.

England is, perhaps, the easiest country to analyze. There is a will to resist in England but at the same time a deep spiritual and physical weariness over the thought of war. Victory did not bring an end to the privation that England's people had endured during the war. Instead, it deepened it. Only in the last year, has England with her efforts and our aid begun to see some solution to her overshadowing dollar problem and to hope again to regain some relief from her self-imposed austerity. Now the shadow of another war, further privation, queues and more queues, face her. It would be too much to expect her people to accept such a prospect with any degree of enthusiasm. There is definite resentment against our Korean policy, partly because she thinks it a waste and diversion of valuable resources which might be devoted to Europe, but more because in bringing us into armed conflict with Red China we have both endangered her precarious position in the Orient and enhanced the possibility of all-out war with Communist Russia. To me, the people were less eager than the Government to take those preliminary steps toward the mobilization of resources and manpower that the will to resist demands.

War weariness, of course, characterizes all Europe. But the problem of France has additional complications. France knows that she will have to bear the lion's share of the manpower necessary for the creation of a Western European force and that her soil together with Germany will probably again be the battleground of any such conflict. She looks longingly to German manpower for assistance and relief from her burden, but at the same time she is unwilling to pay the price that Germany demands for rearming. Jules Moch, France's Minister of War, assured me that time would prove France was right on the issue of not rearming Germany if she insisted upon a national army, and Bidault, the former Prime Minister, echoed this thought. In addition, he expressed the general European fear that rearmament of Germany might incite Russian aggression. General Billotte, De Gaulle's military aide, was in a more aggressive mood. He feared the 5,000,000 Communists in France, their opposition and their neutralism, their power of sabotage. He and De Gaulle, too, he said, would take stern measures to destroy the party were they to come into power, as he thought they would in 6 months. He criticized the present Government and its war effort as weak. As against the 20 divisions by the beginning of 1953 that the Minister of War spoke about, Billotte would have 40 divisions in the field in 1952 and a goal of 75. The Germans, too, he thought, should be brought in even on terms of independence from western control.

France gives me a sense of division and confusion, of hesitation and doubt. Her own economy gives little sense of being attuned toward a war effort. The control of materials and the diversion of production into military channels has not really begun nor is it even being adequately planned. The tax structure, where only 15 percent of the tax receipts come from direct taxation with the balance derived from hidden taxes, seems to slant away from bringing home to the public the burdens that a defense effort must entail. Wages are low and prices high, and no adequate price control exists. A prevalent criticism of France's Government is that it is unable to get through to working people, whereas the Communists succeed in doing so.

In Germany skepticism of the rearmament effort was rife. The German generals I talked with had a more realistic and less fearsome appreciation of Russian military power. They had met the Russian armies in the field and felt they knew them and their weaknesses. At the same time, they are distrustful of France's military strength. The picture of the French rout in 1940 was still vivid in their minds. Politically, everyone insisted that a necessary condition of German rearmament was that Germany must have something to fight for. A consciousness of what happens to a battleground in modern war, such as the devastation that today is Korea, was widespread and there was little desire on the part of the Germans to risk that tragedy unless, as Kurt Schumacher, the head of the Socialist Party and the strongest of Germany's political figures, said, they were assured a West Germany free of Allied control and, secondly, a substantial screen of American troops to shield Germany while she rearmed herself. Even given these two conditions, the army that Germany would be willing to build, must be her own army, officered by her own men, not brigades incorporated into some other force, and that would take months, if not years, to develop.

I could not convince myself that we and this newly formed cause of ours were particularly popular in Germany. They had no love for communism, but in their eyes our measures had been responsible for the disgrace of the German army. We had been preaching the evils of militarism, destroyed their war industries and were still doing so, when at the same time we seem to be urging their rearmament. As a popular joke in Germany these days goes, two Americans leave on a plane from New York, one has a mission to disarm Germany, the other's mission is to urge Germany to rearm; Germany cannot do both.

The recuperation that Germany has shown, however, is extraordinary. Steel, pig iron, coal production have climbed by leaps and bounds. Her national income has almost reached that of England. Her important industrial production and her strategic position in the middle of Europe makes her incorporation into a Western European defense system imperative.

Italy, though a member of the North Atlantic alliance, finds her position precarious. She has achieved some economic recovery despite the difficult burden on her of exporting sufficient to pay for the 60 percent of her food that she must import. Her slim recovery, however, is precious to her people and there is a fear of endangering it by assuming the heavy burdens of rearmament. The peace treaty still limits Italy to an armed force of 175,000 men as well as in the production of war materials and, as such, operates as a deterrent upon her desire to rearm herself. Nevertheless, she has far to go today to fill her allowable army quota.

The nine divisions that are her present goal are not expected to serve outside the country, and the probable area of invasion north of Trieste, the Italians are under obligation not to fortify. The widely expressed concern is that the burden of rearmament will so lower the scale of living that it will fan the Communist parties of the north, so strong in those industrial areas, to make difficult and even to stop her productive effort.

In Yugoslavia I had the opportunity of talking with Marshal Tito and his Minister of Foreign Affairs. The marshal answered the questions I put to him with directness. Czechoslovakia in 1938 made her mistake, he said, in not fighting instead of accepting the partial dismemberment forced on her at Munich. If she had resisted with arms, she would have forced England and France to come in on her side. If attacked, he said, we will fight long enough to bring the West in on our side, for a retreat by us in the north opens the road to Italy while our defeat imperils both Greece and Turkey. In case of attack, our need, he continued, will not be men but equipment—jet planes, tanks, bazookas, and heavy artillery. But America, and he paid respect to her military power, has not yet exhausted the possibilities of an amicable arrangement with Russia. Moreover, America is wasting her strength in Korea. The strategic area today as always, he concluded, is in Europe and not in Asia.

Marshal Tito seemed to have substantially weathered the Russian-Communist forces that initially opposed him in Yugoslavia. The vast majority of the Communists in Yugoslavia had been young and new members and had fought with him in the war, and he had thus succeeded in swinging their allegiance away from Moscow to him. But Yugoslavia is still a sparse and grim country, with recovery slowed by drought, the essential inefficiency of the Communist system, and the absence of Marshall funds. Its people, however, are determined to fight.

Spain again is a picture of poverty but of an army willing to fight. It lacks, however, almost everything needed for modern war. It has no real air force, few trucks, an inadequate rail system, and no antitank weapons. It needs officers conversant with our standards, our specifications, our training, and equipment to boot. The big question mark is whether Western Europe will permit it or invite it to join in the common effort of defense. In England I found distrust and distaste for Franco's help and doubt of its efficacy. In France, Bidault confided these doubts. Bringing Spain in, he said, might give the impression that our line of defense is in the Pyrenees and not on the Rhine and that would be fatal to France and her effort. But there is manpower in Spain, determined and aggressive, but a woeful lack of arms.

The firmness and quality of Europe's will to resist is not an easy subject of analysis. Besides the war-weariness of her peoples, there are the conflicting political ambitions of her nations. There is the precariousness of her hard-won economic recovery that could be overthrown by the heavy drain of rearmament, while waiting for just such an opportunity are the millions of disloyal Communists within her own borders. There is strength, great strength outside the nations of the North Atlantic Pact that still remains unharnessed and, as in the case of Yugoslavia, may be picked off singly before Western Europe can bring itself to a decision. There is Germany, about which there must be some meeting of minds. And although a line of defense for Western Europe must be far east of the Pyrenees, Spain as a base for operations, as a source of power, and because of its strategic position straddling the Mediterranean, can no longer be ignored.

The assessment of Western Europe's potentialities is a necessary condition for shaping the extent and nature of the aid we can and should supply. That program from this country's standpoint cannot be the product of one man's thought or that of a small group. It is this Nation acting through the Congress and the Executive that must fashion that program and coordinate in with our own defense. To do that we must not be afraid of facts or seek to gloss them over by a veneer of trustful but mistaken understanding. If we are to share, we should know the nature of the venture that we are being asked to undertake, what our partners say they will do, and what they actually do or have done. Mutual aid to be successful demands both aid and mutuality. Its conditions should be stipulated at least in broad outline and, if the spirit of mutuality is to endure, those conditions should be met. At the moment, no permanent assessment of the picture can be made and even a tentative one is full of doubt and darkness. In the countries of Western Europe dwell over 200,000,000 people. It has enormous productive powers that can be of immense value to us and can be tragically harmful in the hands of Red Russia. Productive power is the basis of military power, and because of that it is discouraging to an American observer to see the limitations on Europe's rearmament effort. Neither industrial power nor manpower are military assets unless they are efficiently mobilized.

If Europe is to be saved, Europe must commence to make sacrifices sufficient for that purpose and commensurate with the danger that threatens to engulf her peoples. The plain and brutal fact today is that Europe is not making these sacrifices. Except for Yugoslavia and Spain, her military budgets in terms of their proportion of the national income are far below those we propose for ourselves. Her draft of manpower is less severe than what we suggest should govern us here. The nations of the North Atlantic Pact still lack any systems for the control of strategic materials. This effort today is clearly not enough. It is important that Western Europe be saved, but we cannot do so ourselves or pay a price that will endanger our own survival. We cannot link our whole fate to what is presently a desperate gamble. We can and will survive despite Europe, but with her it will be that much easier. But Europe must know, as we are again learning to know, that freedom is born and held only by deep sacrifice.

Our colleague speaks from experience, not from theory. He lost a brother on the eastern front. Commanding a PT boat in the South Pacific, which was blown in two by enemy fire, he, with 12 of his comrades, swam to a small island, from which they were later rescued after a message cut on a coconut was delivered by a native to the Dutch commander at New Guinea.

We know our colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. We know he believes in America. We know his first thought is of the future of this country; that he sees through the eyes of the average man—not through brass-bound glasses—as one who served in the front lines—in the first wave bound for the beach.

Again he is one of us; perhaps, more accurately, one of the younger Members of the House. He is looking forward. He is looking to the future of the country.

He has told us, as I have just read to you, that neither France nor Germany—and that is easily understood—wanted us again to make their countries—France or Germany—the ring where we settled our fights.

As to whether or not this war—world war III—is our war, we have been told by reliable, accurate reporters that the men on the streets in London, as well as some of the members of Parliament and the men on the street in Canada, have time and time again repeated the statement that this is America's war, not their war. Not England's war, not Canada's war, but the war of the United States of America. So I can understand why our colleague who has just left the well, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DORN], having, as he stated, followed our military leaders from Normandy on through into Stassfurt, Germany—I can understand why he, being a young man, wants no more of it for his country. I give full weight to the statement he made when he said that if he could give his life to save this Republic he would do it without hesitation. He offered his life for the safety of his country once before. There is no reason to doubt that he would do it again. Our colleague is looking to the future of his country. He is looking at it as a young man. I speak from the other extreme, as an old, old man who has nothing more to lose in this world. Do you get the point? Nothing more to lose, no more than many others who have been saying for the last few years, "Let us fight them, let us lick them," when all who heard them never would be called to fight, never intended to take any chance at all with their own hide.

Of course, that does not apply to all who talk big about going to war, because some served before, but I have observed in the last 6 or 8 years that those who are most anxious to get us into war are the ones who will not be called to take any part in war.

That gets me to this letter:

NILES, MICH., February 11, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: My husband is in Korea fighting for this country. He left behind two tiny babies and myself. He has been there 3 months and hasn't received even one letter, though I and the rest of the family write every single day and send one or two packages every week. Do you think it would be worth fighting for a country like this that doesn't seem to care what happens to our boys. Just because a bunch of big mouths up in Washington sit back on their thrones nice and safe where not a thing can harm them and say, "We the people want war." How do they know the people want war? Have they ever bothered to ask the people what they want? The people don't even seem to know what we're fighting for? Does anybody? The only sense we can make out of it is that Red China wants to join the UN but the UN doesn't want them because they are Communists. Isn't Russia a Communist? Yes, but she's in the UN. It just doesn't make sense. That's what we, the common people, make out of it. And our men are over there fighting for something like this. They should all tell Truman or whoever it is to go straight to hell and come home.

I suppose she means that that is what the men in Korea should do—but they would be shot if they did it. But I suppose she means that the men in Korea should come home.

Her letter reads further as follows:

All Mr. Truman, etc., can think of is raising taxes. If it was for the sake of our boys over there, we wouldn't mind being taxed to death but our boys don't even have warm enough clothes or any cigarettes. In fact they don't even get the things we send them. Some country over across the pond that probably hasn't any intentions of ever paying back gets all our tax money to buy supplies probably to fight us with. Well, thanks for listening while I blew off a little steam. I feel much better now and hope this crisis will soon come to an end. Sincerely hoping so.

Here are a few other excerpts from letters which could be multiplied many, many times:

It is too late for us as a Nation to make any mistakes. In fact, I believe we have exceeded our quota some time back.

We would like to see the ones who are guilty of creating Korea forced to accept that responsibility. Anyone can see, if they will, that it has been one dumb thing after another that has created the present situation.

How cheerfully a few men seem able to sacrifice the lives of thousands.

I am bitterly opposed to the placing of any boy of a day under 21 years of age in combat. I cannot understand in any degree how anyone could even think of any 18-year-old draft. Of course, actual emergency could alter the case. In a studied action, such as the Korean War, it is horrible to murder off our boys as we are doing.

I would rather go than see a lad under 21 years go. It might take more of us and perhaps cost more money, but it would be cheaper for America in the end.

I have written this for your encouragement, because if there is one single thing I can do to help in the desperate situation we are in, I am ready to do it. There seems to be so little one can do, for America seems determined to seek self-destruction, in any way that appears.

You may consider that my voice is also the voice of many solid-thinking citizens.

That first letter comes from a wife with two small babies. And how many others are there who write you that way? I agree with my colleagues and with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DORN], who told us that it is a hopeless task. It is a hopeless task—it is a task which if we keep at it as was stated yesterday by Mr. Justice Douglas, will not only destroy the freedom and liberty of our people, but will wreck our Republic.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes, revise and extend my remarks, and include a statement by former Acting Secretary of State, Hon. Sumner Welles, regarding Lithuania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, February 16, 1951, marks the thirty-third anniversary of the declaration of independence of Lithuania which began its twentieth century existence as a sovereign political entity in 1918 after more than a century of foreign rule.

The resolute and persevering endeavors of the Republic of Lithuania to reestablish the country as a modern nation were cut short in 1940 when the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics forcefully imposed a Communist administration on its small neighbor and incorporated it against its will into the Soviet Union. On June 14 of that year, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics delivered an ultimatum to Lithuania demanding the creation of a Lithuanian Government sympathetic to the Soviet Union. On the following day Soviet troops occupied Lithuania after which the country was subjected to the familiar Communist-type of election, with the result that the parliament thus formed petitioned on July 21 for incorporation into the U. S. S. R.

The attitude of the United States Government toward the incorporation of Lithuania, as well as of Estonia and Latvia, into the Soviet Union was expressed by Acting Secretary of State Sumner Welles on July 23, 1940, in a statement to the press, which read as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE, THE HONORABLE SUMNER WELLES

During these past few days the devious processes whereunder the political independence and territorial integrity of the three small Baltic republics—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—were to be deliberately annihilated by one of their more powerful neighbors, have been rapidly drawing to their conclusion.

From the day when the peoples of these republics first gained their independence and democratic form of government the people of the United States have watched their admirable progress in self-government with deep and sympathetic interest.

The policy of this Government is universally known. The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities no matter whether they are carried on by the use of force or by the threat of force. They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one state, however powerful, in the domestic concerns of any other sovereign state, however weak.

These principles constitute the very foundations upon which the existing relationship between the 21 sovereign republics of the New World rests.

The United States will continue to stand by these principles, because of the conviction of the American people that unless the doctrine in which these principles are inherent once again governs the relations between nations, the rule of reason, of justice, and of law—in other words the basis of modern civilization itself—cannot be preserved.

The adherence of the United States Government to the fundamental principles expressed at that time is indicated by the fact that this Government has not recognized the incorporation of Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia into the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and continues to recognize the diplomatic and consular representatives of those countries in the United States.

The attitude of the United States Government toward Lithuania and the continuing active interest which this Government maintains in the welfare of the Lithuanian people are further indicated by the fact that Voice of America broadcasts in the Lithuanian language are being inaugurated on February 16, 1951. This broadcast, marking the thirty-third anniversary of the declaration of Lithuanian independence in so significant a manner, will be the first of a series of programs which will be beamed regularly to Lithuania in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the Lithuanians in this country and all over the world in trying to help Lithuania regain her freedom from communism and Russian domination. It is a hard time for the Lithuanians as they are battling against Communistic rule. We join with other freedom loving countries in extending good wishes to them in their fight for freedom and the protection of their people. The fact that the United States is greatly interested in them is shown by the Voice of America broadcasts beginning tomorrow to Lithuania in the Lithuanian language.

Good luck to the Lithuanians and may they very soon again be free.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 29, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, we come asking that Thou wilt refresh our souls and restore our faith as in all the bewilderment of the world's fiery strife our burdened hearts seek the quiet sanctuary of Thy healing presence. We would face the responsibilities committed to our hands in the daily sense of the eternal. Our insights are not deep enough for the solving of the tangled tragedy of our ailing world. In tense times that tempt to petulance, grant us the grace of patience, remembering always that courtesy is rarer than courage and that a soft answer turneth away wrath. Save us from being little men in a great day and from the futile endeavor to match the expanding pattern of a new world being born in travail with the outworn conceptions of a world that is dead.

Make this ancient Chamber of our national life a place of vision, a lighthouse of hope above the raging floods of human disaster and distress. We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. McFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 15, 1951, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2141. An act to extend for 2 years the existing privilege of free importation of gifts from members of the Armed Forces of the United States on duty abroad; and

TRIBUTE TO WOUNDED VETERANS VISITING THE SENATE

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I understand that there is now in the gallery, and facing me as I stand here, a group of veterans from the Korean conflict, who have been casualties in that conflict. I know that in rising and making these very brief remarks I am expressing the feeling of every Member of the Senate. I say to these veterans: You have our deep gratitude. We are proud of what you have been doing. You have shown a loyalty and a patriotism which should be an example for everyone in this country. We wish you well. You are most welcome here.

COMMUNICATION FROM CERTAIN MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT OF INDIA REGARDING EMERGENCY FOOD RELIEF

The VICE PRESIDENT. In his capacity as President of the Senate, the Chair has received a communication from certain members of the Indian Parliament with reference to the arrangement to provide a certain amount of grain for the people of India. If there be no objection, the Chair would like to have the communication read at the desk, and the names of the members printed in the RECORD.

The communication was read, as follows:

NEW DELHI, February 16, 1951.

VICE PRESIDENT, SENATE, CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C.:

Undersigned members of Indian Parliament belonging to various Ipuchies groups and states request you place this message before honorable Members of Senate. Consideration by your House of proposal for gift to India of food grains to help this country tide over present shortage and mitigate distress to our people will be watched keenly by many here. We are among those in India who are opposed to totalitarianism in all its forms and recognize that liberty and integrity of free countries of Asia including our own are being menaced by Communist expansionism. We have, on the other hand, watched with appreciation the great effort for the welfare of the free world embodied in Marshall aid and the point 4 program. We would like to see United States and India cooperate with countries of commonwealth and other democracies in securing world peace through collective security, convinced as we are that the bulk of the Indian people believe in the democratic way of life and recognize in the democracies of the world their natural friends and allies. We should be happy to see our fellow legislators in United States Congress give their approval to proposal now before them moved by the needs of the people of India and uninfluenced by momentary differences of policy we are confident such a gesture of solidarity on the part of the representatives of the American people toward the people of India would strengthen friendship and understanding between our two countries and bring them closer together.

The names of the members of the Parliament of India were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Kalavati Dikshit and Messrs. Nasiruddin Ahmad, Frank Anthony, Lakshmanrao Bhatkar, Satish Chandra, Jagannath Das, T. Y. Desphande, G. A. Dholokia, G. S. Guha, A. B. Gurung, H. C. Heda, T. Husain, R. L. Jangde, P. S. Khaparde, S. N. Mahatta, R. L. Malviya, M. R. Masani, Bhopindersingh Man, M. A. Hasan, M. P. Misra, H. G. Mudgal, N. P. Nathwani, M. Y. Nurie, C. M. Poonacha, R. P. Potai, T. D. Pustake, Arigay Ramaswamy, N. G. Ranga, K. V. Reddi, M. C. Reddy, Syamanandan Shaya, Awdeshpratap Singh, Jaipal Singh, Jaswant Singh, Sardar Singh, J. I. Brajkshore, Peeasad Sinha, Shambhunath Shukla, Jawalaprasad Srivastava, Abulhasan Syedali, B. L. Tiwari, K. S. Vaidya, V. P. Vaidya, and B. H. Zaidi.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to make insertions in the RECORD, introduce bills and joint resolutions, submit reports, present petitions and memorials, and transact other routine business, without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF GENERAL CRIMINAL CODE

A letter from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, transmitting a proposed amendment to the General Criminal Code, relating to fraud by radio; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"House Joint Memorial 2

"Memorializing the Congress of the United States to ward off foreign invasion of fundamental American rights

"Whereas by paragraph 2 of article II of the Constitution of the United States it is provided that the President of the United States 'shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur;' and by paragraph 2 of article VI of the same Constitution it is provided that 'this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, and that judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding;' and

"Whereas in the spring of 1950 in the case of Fujii v. State, in a unanimous decision of the Court of Appeals of California, it was decided that the United Nations Charter, which is a treaty approved by the President and Senate, not only repealed certain laws of the State of California, but extended that repeal to citizens of a country not a party to the treaty and to an individual not eligible for citizenship in the United States; and

"Whereas it thus appears that the constitution and laws of every State in the Union, and possibly the Constitution and laws of the United States, can be amended or repealed by the President and the Senate, thus disclosing a peril to the very fundamentals of American law and liberty, and the entire theory of popular government, a peril which certainly the founding fathers never contemplated and which must be obviated at the earliest possible moment: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives of the thirty-eighth general assembly (the senate concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States be and it is hereby petitioned and urged to immediately submit to the several States an amendment to the United States Constitution providing that no treaty made under the authority of the United States may amend or supersede any portion of the United States Constitution unless submitted and ratified as at present required for amendments to that Constitution, nor repeal or amend any provision of the constitution of any State unless submitted and ratified as provided by the constitution and laws of such State; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this joint memorial be immediately forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the United States from the State of Colorado, and to each of the governors of the other 47 States comprising the United States.

"DAVID C. HAMIL,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.
"K. EVELYN MILLER,
"Assistant Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.
"GORDON ALLOTT,
"President of the Senate.
"MILDRED H. CRESSWELL,
"Secretary of the Senate."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Joint Resolution 1

"A joint resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, relating to the terms of office of the President of the United States

"Whereas both Houses of the Eightieth Congress of the United States of America, by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, made the following proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States of America relating to the number of terms which any one person may hold the office of the President of the United States of America, which proposal is in the following words, namely:

"'Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

"'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"' "ARTICLE —

"' "SECTION 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

"' "SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."'

"Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming:

"SECTION 1. That the said above-proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be and the same is hereby ratified by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming.

"SEC. 2. That certified copies of this joint resolution be forwarded by the governor of this State to the Secretary of State at Washington, D. C., to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

"ROBERT C. RYMILL,
"President of the Senate.
"FRANK C. MOCKLER,
"Speaker of the House.

"Approved February 12.
"FRANK A. BARRETT,
"Governor."

An act of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"An act concerning mutual military aid and assistance by and between the State of New Jersey and other States, in an emergency and approving and agreeing to an interstate compact therefor

"Whereas on the twelfth day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fifty, the Governor of the State of New York, for and on behalf of the State of New York, and the Governor of the State of New Jersey, for and on behalf of the State of New Jersey, agreed to an interstate compact for mutual military aid and assistance between such respective States, in an emergency; and

"Whereas article II of said compact provides: 'This compact shall become effective as to the signatory States when the legislatures thereof have approved it and when the Congress has given its consent either before or after the date hereof. Any State not a party to this compact at the date hereof may become a party hereto'; and

"Whereas it is the purpose and object of said compact to promote the national security and the security of the States signatory thereto, and further protect the public health, safety and welfare; and

"Whereas it is the purpose and object of this act to approve said interstate compact; and

"Whereas, by the provisions of chapter 68 of the laws of 1950, the Governor of this State is authorized from time to time to enter into agreements with Governors of States bordering on New Jersey for the protection in the event of emergency of interstate bridges, tunnels, ferries and other communications facilities between New Jersey and such other States: Therefore be it

"Enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

"1. The State of New Jersey does hereby agree to, approve, and enter into a solemn compact with the State of New York (upon that State concurring therein, or otherwise approving thereof by appropriate legislation) and with such other States as likewise concur therein or otherwise approve thereof, in form and terms as heretofore agreed to by the Governor of the State of New Jersey and the Governor of the State of New York, as follows:

"' An interstate compact for mutual military aid in an emergency

"' ARTICLE I

"'1. The purposes of this compact are:

"'a. to provide for mutual military aid and assistance in an emergency by the military forces of a signatory State to the military forces of the other signatory States or of the United States, including among other military missions, the protection of interstate bridges, tunnels, ferries, pipelines, communications facilities and other vital installations, plants and facilities; and the military support of civil defense agencies;

"'b. to provide for the fresh pursuit in case of an emergency, by the military forces or any part or member thereof of a signatory State into another State, of insurrectionists, saboteurs, enemies or enemy forces or persons seeking or appearing to seek to overthrow the Government of the United States or of a signatory State;

"'e. to make provision for the powers, duties, rights, privileges and immunities of the members of the military forces of a signatory State while so engaged outside of their own State.

"'(2) a. "Emergency" as used in this compact shall mean and include invasion or other hostile action, disaster, insurrection or imminent danger thereof.

"'b. "State" as used in this compact shall include any signatory State.

"'c. "Military forces" as used in this compact shall include the organized militia, or any force thereof, of a signatory State.

"' ARTICLE II

"'This compact shall become effective as to the signatory States when the Legislatures thereof have approved it and when the Congress has given its consent either before or after the date hereof. Any State not a party to this compact at the date hereof may become a party hereto.

"' ARTICLE III

"'The Governor of each signatory State or his designated military representative shall constitute the committee for mutual military aid for the signatory States. It shall be the duty of the committee for mutual military aid to make joint plans for the employment of the military forces of the signatory States for mutual military aid and assistance in case of emergency.

"' ARTICLE IV

"'(1) It shall be the duty of each signatory State to integrate its plan for the employment of its military forces in case of emergency with the joint plans recommended by the committee for mutual military aid and with the emergency plans of the Armed Forces of the United States.

"'(2) In case of emergency, upon the request of the Governor of a signatory State, the Governor of each signatory State, to the extent consistent with the needs of his own State, shall order its military forces or such part thereof as he, in his discretion, may find necessary, to assist the military forces of the requesting State in order to carry out the purposes set forth in this compact. In such case, it shall be the duty of the Governor of each signatory State receiving such a request to issue the necessary orders for such use of the military forces of his State without the borders of his State and to direct the commander of such forces to place them under the operational control of the commander of the forces of the requesting State or of the United States which may be engaged in meeting the emergency.

"'(3) The Governor of any signatory State, in his discretion, may recall the military forces of his State serving without its borders or any part or any member of such forces.

"' ARTICLE V

"'In case of an emergency, any unit or member of the military forces of a signatory State which has been ordered into active service by the Governor may upon order of the officer in immediate command thereof continue beyond the borders of its own State into another signatory State in fresh pursuit of insurrectionists, saboteurs, enemies or enemy forces or persons seeking or appearing to seek to overthrow the Government of the United States or of any one of the signatory States, until they are apprehended by such unit or member. Any such person who shall be apprehended or captured in a signatory State by a unit or member of the military forces of another signatory State shall without unnecessary delay be surrendered to the military or police forces of the State in which he is taken or to the forces of the United States. Such surrender shall not constitute a waiver by the State of the military forces making the capture, of its right to extradite or prosecute such persons for any crime committed in that State.

" 'ARTICLE VI

" '(1) Whenever the military forces or any part thereof of any signatory State are engaged outside of their own State in carrying out the purposes of this compact, the individual members of such military forces so engaged shall not be liable, civilly or criminally, for any act or acts done by them in the performance of their duty.

" '(2) The individual members of such forces shall have the same powers, duties, rights, privileges and immunities as the members of the military forces of the State in which they are engaged, but in any event,

" '(3) Each signatory State shall save harmless any member of its military forces wherever serving and any member of the military forces of any other signatory State serving within its borders for any act or acts done by them in the performance of their duty while engaged in carrying out the purposes of this compact.

" 'ARTICLE VII

" '(1) Each signatory State shall provide, in the same amounts and manner as if they were on duty within their own State, for the pay and allowances of the personnel of its military forces, and for the medical and hospital expenses, disability and death benefits, pensions and funeral expenses of wounded, injured or sick personnel and of dependents or representatives of deceased personnel of its military forces, in case such personnel shall suffer wounds, injuries, disease, disability or death while engaged without the State pursuant to this compact and while going to and returning from such other signatory State. Each signatory State shall provide in the same amounts and manner as if they were on duty within their own State for the logistical support and for other costs and expenses of its military forces while engaged without the State pursuant to this compact and while going to and returning from such other signatory State.

" '(2) Any signatory State rendering outside aid in case of insurrection or disaster not the result of invasion or hostile action, shall, if it so elects be reimbursed by the signatory State receiving such aid for the pay and allowances of its personnel, logistical support and all other costs and expenses referred to in section 1 of this article and incurred in connection with the request for aid. Such election shall be exercised by the Governor of the aiding State presenting a statement and request for reimbursement of such costs and expenses to the Governor of the requesting State.

" 'ARTICLE VIII

" 'Nothing in this compact shall be construed to limit or restrict the power of any signatory State in case of an emergency affecting that State only, to provide for the internal defense of any part of the territory of said State or for the protection and control of any bridge, tunnel, ferry, installation, plant or facility or any part thereof within the borders of such State or to prohibit the enforcement of any laws, rules and regulations or the execution of any plan with regard thereto.

" 'ARTICLE IX

" 'This compact shall continue in force and remain binding on each signatory State until the legislature or the Governor of such State gives notice of withdrawal therefrom. Such notice of withdrawal shall not be effective until 6 months after said notice has been given to the Governor of each of the other signatory States.

" 'In witness whereof, the States whose Governors have signed below have become parties to this compact.

" 'DECEMBER 12, 1950.

" '[SEAL] THOMAS E. DEWEY,
" 'Governor of New York.

" 'Attest:
" 'THOMAS J. CURRAN,
" 'Secretary of State of the State of New York.

" '[SEAL] ALFRED E. DRISCOLL,
" 'Governor of New Jersey.

" 'By the Governor:
" 'LLOYD B. MARSH,
" 'Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey.'

"2. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed as limiting, directly or indirectly, the power of the Governor to enter into interstate compacts or other agreements relating to mutual military aid and assistance in an emergency or impairing in any respect the force and effect thereof.

"3. This act shall take effect immediately."

By Mr. MUNDT:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 5

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States; His Excellency the President of the United States; the Secretary of State of the United States; the Secretary of Defense of the United States; and the Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Secretary for Air of the Department of Defense of the United States, not to commit the Armed Forces of the United States for duty or service except as is authorized by a fair interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States

"Whereas the power to lay and collect taxes to provide for the defense of the United States, but not for the defense of other nations, and the powers to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to provide for calling forth the militia for specific purposes, and to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution said powers are all expressly vested by the Constitution of the United States in the Congress and not in some other branch or department of the Federal Government; and

"Whereas it is manifest that the executive branch of the Federal Government has been and is now assuming to exercise the powers of Congress respecting the land and naval forces of the Nation without regard to the exclusive authority in Congress in the premises: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate of the State of South Dakota (the house of representatives concurring therein), That His Excellency the President of the United States and his Cabinet be memorialized not to execute or enter into any secret treaties or other agreements with any foreign power or powers which would commit the Armed Forces of the United States for duties or services in any country other than the United States and then only pursuant to the acts of Congress as authorized by the Constitution of the United States; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the President of the United States, to the Honorable Secretary of State of the United States, the Honorable Secretary of Defense of the United States, the chairman of the committees of defense of both Houses of Congress, Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air of the Department of Defense, the Honorable KARL MUNDT and the Honorable FRANCIS CASE, United States Senators from South Dakota, to the Honorable HAROLD O. LOVRE and the Honorable E. Y. BERRY, Representatives in Congress from South Dakota, and to the Presiding Officers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States."

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the President and United States officials to remove the order from the Office of Price Stabilization affecting cotton issued January 25, 1951

"Whereas cotton is one of the basic industries of this Nation; and

"Whereas cotton has long been the basis of South Carolina's economic life and the growing and processing reaches into every phase of the life of the citizens of South Carolina and the Nation; and

"Whereas the United States is in a critical period and cotton is essential to the national defense effort; and

"Whereas at the present time cotton is in temporary short supply and the cotton farmers and producers of South Carolina and the Nation have been asked to produce more than 16,000,000 bales of cotton a part of the national defense effort which is a 60-percent increase in production; and

"Whereas, due to the recent Federal regulations as contained in the order from the Office of Price Stabilization issued January 25, 1951, free trade and free flow of this commodity is at a complete standstill and conditions have become chaotic adversely affecting the farmers, cotton merchants, manufacturers, ginners, warehousemen, bankers, transportation systems, and directly, or indirectly, all phases of normal business: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring). That the President of the United States and the proper governmental agencies, including the United States Department of Agriculture and the Office of Price Stabilization, are requested to immediately remove the present unworkable order pertaining to cotton in order to permit the resumption of normal distribution and processing of raw cotton; to assure the cotton farmer that the 16,000,000 bales he has been asked to produce by our Government will move readily as in the past; be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of the senate immediately transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States; the United States Secretary of Agriculture, Charles S. Brannan; the Administrator of the Office of Price Stabilization, Michael DiSalle; and to the South Carolina Members of Congress."

By Mr. THYE:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Finance:

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to take appropriate action toward the establishment of reciprocal agreements between the Governments of the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the duty-free mutual transshipment of crude petroleum, natural gas, and petroleum byproducts between the respective countries

"Whereas the Dominion of Canada is and has been a large consumer of crude petroleum and petroleum byproducts, which products have been admitted duty free to the Dominion of Canada; and

"Whereas recent discoveries of extensive petroleum deposits and natural gas-producing areas in the Province of Alberta in the Dominion of Canada are being developed, and

"Whereas crude petroleum will be transported by pipeline through the States of North Dakota and Minnesota to Superior, Wis., and thence to Sarnia, Ont., for refining; and

"Whereas tentative plans call for the building of two oil refineries in the vicinity of Superior, Wis., for the refining of additional quantities of petroleum products from the Alberta fields; and

"Whereas these petroleum imports to be refined in the Superior area should be afforded means through elimination of discriminatory import duties by which they can be made available to American consumers; and

"Whereas the availability of large supplies of petroleum, natural gas, and petroleum byproducts is essential to the growth of industry, the assurance of fuel supply, and the general economic well-being of our people: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate of the State of Minnesota (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be urged to take the necessary steps through proper authorities toward the consummation of reciprocal agreements between the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of the United States to the end that there will be equitable freedom of exchange of crude petroleum, natural gas, and petroleum byproducts uninhibited by the imposition of restrictive import duties."

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS BY STATE OF NEW YORK—RESOLUTION OF LEGISLATURE OF STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks the text of a concurrent resolution recently adopted by the New York State Legislature, which respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which will (1) prohibit the Federal Security Agency from imposing arbitrary administrative requirements such as State-wide standards of assistance save as specifically authorized by Congress, and (2) prohibit the Federal Security Administrator from disrupting long-established State civil service procedures by imposing special requirements for public employees engaged in administering the federally aided programs of public assistance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution of the senate and assembly, memorializing the Congress of the United States respecting proposed administrative requirements sought to be imposed upon the State of New York regarding public assistance programs

Whereas the State of New York in its public-assistance programs has consistently endeavored to provide for the requirements of its needy persons on a humane and individualized basis and has maintained a system of public assistance which is among the best in the Nation; and

Whereas the Federal Security Agency has threatened to withhold from the State of New York Federal funds for aid to dependent children, old age assistance, aid to the blind, and for the new program of aid to the disabled unless the State of New York acquiesces to two arbitrary conditions sought to be imposed by the Federal Security Agency; and

Whereas one of these conditions would mandate an inflexible State-wide standard of assistance requiring all persons receiving assistance under a welfare program to receive mechanically the same benefits in total disregard of individualized needs; and

Whereas express authority for the imposition of such a requirement has not been granted by Congress to the Federal Security Agency and the making of such a demand represents an arbitrary exercise of administrative power and would result in the subordination of the needs of the people of this State to the convenience of Government administrators; and

Whereas a second condition imposed by the Federal Security Agency seeks to require the State of New York to depart from its long-established civil-service system and compel the adoption of special civil service standards and procedures for employees dealing with Federal welfare programs or a general revision of our civil service system; and

Whereas the result of acquiescence in any such demand would permit a single Federal administrator by administrative fiat to override the legislature of the State of New York and impress the views of a Federal agency in a matter of general State administration not directly involved in the Federal program; and

Whereas the State of New York has the oldest State civil service law in this country, having established a merit system in 1883, which has been administered under the supervision of a bipartisan commission with the general approval of civil service employees, civil service groups, and the people of the State; and

Whereas no objection has been raised relative to the sufficiency of public assistance programs or to the adequacy of aid furnished to the needy of the State of New York, and the conditions sought to be imposed by the Federal Security Agency are neither necessary nor desirable: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the people of the State of New York, through their representatives in the senate and assembly, hereby respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which will—

1. Prohibit the Federal Security Agency from imposing arbitrary administrative requirements such as State-wide standards of assistance save as specifically authorized by Congress;

2. Prohibit the Federal Security Administrator from disrupting long-established State civil-service procedures by imposing special requirements for public employees engaged in administering the federally aided programs of public assistance; and be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate of the United States, and to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress elected from the State of New York.

By order of the senate.

WILLIAM S. KING,
Secretary.

In assembly February 14, 1951, concurred in without amendment.

By order of assembly.

ANSLEY B. BORKOWSKI,
Clerk.

VOLUNTEER FREEDOM CORPS—RESOLUTION OF BOSTON (MASS.) CITY COUNCIL

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the City Council of Boston, Mass., favoring the establishment of a volunteer freedom corps and increasing the number of voluntary alien enlistees from 2,500 to 25,000.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Boston City Council in meeting assembled commend United States Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE for his constant insistence that aliens be inducted into the Armed Forces of the United States and that this body go on record as favoring the enactment of the proposed legislation which will increase the number of voluntary alien enlistees from 2,500 to 25,000 as well as the establishment of the Volunteer Freedom Corps of 250,000 to serve abroad for a period of 2 years.

In city council February 5, 1951, adopted.

Attest:

W. J. MALLOY,
City Clerk.

GRANTING OF CITIZENSHIP TO CERTAIN PARENTS OF UNITED STATES SERVICEMEN—RESOLUTION OF AMERICAN-PORTUGUESE LOYALTY ASSOCIATION, INC., FALL RIVER, MASS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the American-Portuguese Loyalty Association, Inc., of Fall River, Mass., relating to the granting of citizenship to the parents of United States servicemen who have not been able to meet the English-language requirements.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN-PORTUGUESE LOYALTY ASSOCIATION, INC., OF FALL RIVER, MASS.,
Fall River, Mass., February 10, 1951.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: The following is the resolution unanimously adopted by the above-mentioned organization:

"Resolved, That the American-Portuguese Loyalty Association, Inc., of Fall River, Mass., send this resolution to the Honorable United States Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., of Massachusets, approving and supporting a bill introduced by Senator LODGE in the United States Senate which will confer citizenship on the parents of United States servicemen who have not been able to meet the English-language requirements."

Unanimously adopted.

Sincerely yours,

JOSE SILVA,
President.

PROTESTS AGAINST COMPULSORY HEALTH-INSURANCE LEGISLATION—RESOLUTIONS

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference 43 resolutions from organizations in North Carolina, expressing opposition to the compulsory health-insurance measures which have been proposed for adoption in the Senate. These resolutions come from various organizations throughout the State. Several are from medical societies in various districts in North Carolina, others are from women's clubs throughout the State, others are from civic clubs like Kiwanis, Rotary, Lions, and other similar organizations, others are from senior and junior chambers of commerce throughout the State. Altogether, this represents a cross section of the citizens in North Carolina and indicates that our people are definitely opposed to any compulsory health-insurance law and any other measure which leads in the direction of socialized medicine. In our State we do not believe in socialistic ventures of this character. I am definite in my view that the Federal Government should lend Federal aid and assistance to the local organizations so that they might carry on together a program which provides better health facilities, such as the building of hospitals, the conducting of clinics, and the establishment of other health programs under local direction. I ask that these resolutions be referred to the appropriate committee and that one of the resolutions and the accompanying letter listing the organizations be presented following my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and, without objection, one of the resolutions and the letter will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from North Carolina.

The resolution and letter are as follows:

Whereas the United States has the highest standards of health, of medical care, and of scientific medical facilities of any country in the world, as a result of our system of free enterprise; and

Whereas compulsory health insurance wherever tried has caused a decline in national health and deterioration of medical standards and facilities; and

Whereas, wherever Government has assumed control of medical services, the result has been tremendous multiplication of costs over original estimates, extreme tax burdens and national deficits, and gradual extension of socialization into other activities of national life: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Roanoke Rapids Merchants Association does hereby go on record against any form of compulsory health insurance or any system of political medicine designed for national bureaucratic control;

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each Senator from the State of North Carolina and the Representative from our district, and that said Senators and Representative be and are hereby respectfully requested to use every effort at their command to prevent the enactment of such legislation.

W. GRAHAM LYNCH,
President.

Mrs. KATHLEEN C. DAVIS,
Secretary.

Dated this 12th day of October 1950.
